cup-shaped mouthpiece, a long cylindrical or a short conical tube, and a flaring bell. The tones are produced by the vibrations of the player's lips. The fundamental tone of the tube depends on its length, but by varying the force of the breath and the method of embouchure, a considerable series of harmonics can also be produced, so that the compass of the instrument extends to about four octaves, the tones in the upper part of the series lying close together. By the addition of a slide, like that of the trombone, or of valves, as in the cornet-a-pistons, or of finger-holes and keys, as in the key-bugle and the serpent, a large number of other tones can be secured, so as to give a very full and continuous compass, well adjusted as to intonation. The fundamental tone can be extensively varied in modern instruments by the use of crooks. The trumpet is the typical instrument of a very numerous family of instruments, of which the horn, the bugle, the cornet, the trombone, the tuba, the euphonium, and the serpent are prominent members. The name trumpet itself has been applied to a large number of different instruments at different times. In ancient times two varieties were important—the one straight (the tuba), and the other curved (the lituus), the latter being often made of wood or horn. In the medieval period the evolution of a great number of variants was rapid, with little emphasis on any one distinctively known as the trumpet. In the eighteenth century, and early in the nineteenth, the present orchestral trumpet reached its full development in a twice-doubled tube about five and a half feet long (or with the longest crook eight feet), without keys or valves, but with a short slide for correcting the intonation of certain of the upper tones and for adding intermediate tones. The artistic value of this instrument is great; but in most cases music written for it is now generally given to valve-instruments of the cornet kind, whose tone can never be as pure and true. The use of the trumpet was frequent with Bach and Handel, under the names clarino and principale. The instrument is most common now in works of a martial or festal character, but it is also useful for adding color to various combinations, especially with other wind-instruments. Music for the trumpet is traditionally written in the key of C, and the intended fundamental tone (to be obtained by the use of the appropriate crook) is indicated at the beginning, as "clarino in F" or "tromba in E." Instruments of the trumpet class have always been used for military purposes, especially for signaling and in military bands.

Trumpet, or a lyttle trumpe, that clepythe to mete, or men togedur. Sistrum.
Prompt. Parv., p. 504.

2. In organ-building, a powerful reed-stop, having a tone somewhat resembling that of a trumpet.—3. A trumpeter; one who sounds a trumpet, either literally or figuratively.

And att every Corse the Trumpettes and the mynstrellys com lüne a for them.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 12.

To be the trumpet of his own virtues.
Shak., Much Ado, v. 2. 87.

4. A sound like that of a trumpet; a loud cry, especially that of the elephant.

The elephant curled up his trunk, gave one shrill trumpet, and made off into the bush. St. Nicholas, XVII, 845.

5. A funnel- or trumpet-shaped conductor or guide used in many forms of drawing, doubling, spinning, or other machines to guide the slivers, rovings, yarns, wire, or other materials to the machine, and at once to compact them. It is made in many shapes, but in all the flaring trumpet-mouth is suggested.—6. The flaring mouth of a draw-head of a railway-car, serving to guide the coupling to the pin or other fastening.—7. A trumpet-shell or sea-trumpet; a triton. See cuts under chank and Triton.—8. One of the pitcher-plants, Sarracenia flava. See trumpetleaf.—Feast of trumpets, a feast among the Jews, enjoined by the law of Moses, held, as a celebration of the New Year, on the first and second days of the month Tisri, the seventh month of the Jewish civil year and the first of the ecclesiastical year. It derived its name from the special use of trumpets in its solemnities.—Flourish of trumpets. See flourish.—Hearing-trumpet. Same as ear-trumpet.—Marine trumpet. Same as sea-trumpet.—Speaking trumpet. See speaking-trumpet.—To blow one's own trumpet. See blow.—Trumpet marine. Same as sea-trumpet.

trumpet (trum'pet), v. [F. trumpet = Sp. trompetear = It. trombettare; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To publish by sound of trumpet; hence, to blaze or noise abroad; proclaim; celebrate.

So tart a favour
To trumpet such good tidings!
Shak., A. and C., ii. 5. 39.

2. To form with a swell or in the shape of a bell or funnel.

Their ends [of wire] were passed into two small trumpet holes in a stout brass plate and soldered to the back of the plate. Philos. Mag., 5th ser., XXVIII, 95.

II. intrans. To sound a trumpet; also, to emit a loud trumpet-like sound or cry, as an elephant.

They [elephants] became confused and buddled, and jostled each other until one old bull, furiously trumpeting, led the way to the shore. St. Nicholas, XVII, 763.

trumpet-animalcule (trum'pet-an-i-mal'kūl), n. A stentor. See cuts under Folliculina and Stentor.

trumpet-ash (trum'pet-ash), n. See trumpet-creeper.

trumpet-banner (trum'pet-ban'ēr), n. A small flag attached to a trumpet so as to hang down and be displayed when the trumpet is sounded. In the middle ages it was customary to depict upon the flag the arms of the noble in whose service the trumpet was sounded.

trumpet-call (trum'pet-kāl), n. A call by the sound of the trumpet; hence, any loud or imperative summons to action.

trumpet-conch (trum'pet-kongk), n. A trumpet-shell; a member of the Tritonidae. See cut under Triton.

trumpet-creeper (trum'pet-krē'pēr), n. A woody climbing vine, Tecoma radicans, native in the south of the United States, and cultivated elsewhere for ornament. It bears pinnate leaves with nine- or eleven-toothed leaflets, and flowers with a tubular funnelform corolla approaching 3 inches in length. It is quite hardy and a vigorous grower, climbing high trees, or covering walls, by means of aerial rootlets. It is at its best in alluvial soils southward. More often, but less specifically, called trumpet-flower, sometimes trumpet-rue and trumpet-ash. See cut under Bignoniaceae.

trumpeter (trum'pet-ēr), n. [= D. trompetter = G. Dan. trompetter = Sw. trompetare; as trumpet + -er. Cf. OF. trompateur, trompetteur; also Sp. trompetero = Pg. trombetairo = It. trombettiere.] 1. One who sounds a trumpet.

Trumpeters,
With brazen din blast you the city's ear.
Shak., A. and C., iv. 8. 36.

2. One who proclaims or publishes.

Is it not meant damnably in us, to be trumpeters of our unlawful intents?
Shak., All's Well, iv. 3. 32.

3. A breed of domestic pigeons, so called from the peenility of their cooing. There are several color-varieties.—4. A South American bird of the genus Sophia or family Sophiidae. The common or gold-breasted trumpeter is P. crepitans; there are several others. See cut under agami.

5. The trumpeter-swan, Olor buccinator, the largest swan of North America, distinguished from the common swan, or whistler, by having no yellow spot on the bill, which is also differently shaped, the nostrils occupying a different relative position, as well as by its notably larger size. It inhabits chiefly western parts of the continent, but has been seen in Canada. See cut in next column, and compare hooper, a name of an English swan.

6. A large food-fish of New Zealand and Australian waters, Lutris hecateia, belonging to the family Cirrhitidae, and attaining a weight of about 60 pounds.—Sergeant trumpeter. See sergeant.—Trumpeter's muscle, in anat., the buccinator. Trumpeter-swan. See def. 5.

Trumpeter swan (Olor buccinator).

trumpet-fish (trum'pet-fish), n. 1. A fish of the family Centriscidae, as Centriscus scolopax; a bellows-fish or sea-snipe; so called from the long tubular snout. See cut under snipe-fish.—2. A fish of the family Fistulariidae; a tobacco-pipe fish.

trumpet-flower (trum'pet-flou'ēr), n. 1. A plant of the genus Tecoma or of the allied genus Bignonia; so called with reference to the shape of the flowers. The best-known, perhaps, is T. radicans, the trumpet-creeper. T. grandiflora, the great trumpet-flower of China and Japan, is a less hardy and less high-climbing, but even more showy vine, having orange-scarlet bell-shaped flowers 3 inches broad, borne in clusters, each flower drooping. T. stans, the shrubby trumpet-flower, is a neat shrub 4 feet high with lemon-yellow flowers in large clusters, hardly only southward. Greenhouse species are T. capensis of South Africa with curved orange flowers, and T. jasminoides of Australia with white flowers purple in the throat. Bignonia capreolata of the southern United States, the cross-vine or quarter-vine (see both words), or tendrilled trumpet-flower, has large reddish-yellow flowers borne singly, and is moderately hardy at the north. B. venusta from Brazil is a gorgeous greenhouse climber with scarlet flowers.

2. One of various plants of other genera, as Salandra, Brunfelsia, Catalpa (West Indies), and Datura, especially D. aurea and other South American species, being trees with pendent blossoms.—Evergreen trumpet-flower, the yellow jasmine, Gelsemium sempervirens, once classed in the genus Bignonia.—Peach-colored trumpet-flower, Salandra grandiflora.—Shrubby trumpet-flower. See def. 1.—Tendrilled trumpet-flower. See def. 1.—Virginian trumpet-flower, a foreign name of the trumpet-creeper.

trumpet-fly (trum'pet-flī), n. Same as gray-fly.

trumpet-gall (trum'pet-gāl), n. A small trumpet-shaped gall occurring commonly upon grape-vines in the United States. The adult fly is not known, but from the gall alone the species has been called by Osten Sacken Cecidomyia rufis-ruficoda.

trumpet-gourd (trum'pet-gōrd), n. See gourd, 1. trumpet-honeysuckle (trum'pet-hun'ē-suk-l), n. See honeysuckle, 1.

trumpeting (trum'pet-ing), n. [< trumpet + -ing.] 1. The act of sounding a trumpet, of emitting a trumpet-like sound, or of publishing by or as by sounding a trumpet.—2. In coal-mining, a division made in a shaft for ventilation or other purposes. What is generally called trumpeting is a compartment or passageway built vertically along one corner of the shaft by an arched brattice of brick.

trumpet-jasmine (trum'pet-jas'min), n. See Tecoma.

trumpet-keck (trum'pet-kek), n. See keck, 3.

trumpet-lamp (trum'pet-lamp), n. The name given by coal-miners in England to the Mueseler or Belgian safety-lamp. See safety-lamp.

trumpetleaf (trum'pet-lēf), n. One of several species of Sarracenia or pitcher-plant, found in the southern United States, with leaves more like trumpets than like pitchers. Of these S. flava, yellow trumpetleaf or trumpets, has yellow flowers, and erect leaves from 1 to 3 feet long with an open mouth and erect hood; S. variolaris, spotted trumpetleaf, also yellow-flowered, has the leaves spotted toward the end, broadly winged, with an ovate hood overarching the mouth; S. rubra, red flowered trumpetleaf, has crimson flowers and slender leaves, with an erect hood around the mouth; and S. Drummondii, great trumpetleaf, has similar but longer leaves, with the hood variegated and purple-veined, the flowers deep-purple and very large.

trumpet-lily (trum'pet-lī'i), n. The calla-lily, Richardia africana, also, Lilium longiflorum, and some other true lilies.

trumpet-major (trum'pet-mā'jor), n. A head trumpeter in a band or regiment.

trumpet-milkweed (trum'pet-milk'wēd), n. Same as wild lettuce (b) (which see, under lettuce). Also trumpetweed.

trumpet-reed (trum'pet-rēd), n. See reed. trumpetry (trum'pet-ri), n. [< trumpet + -try.] Trumpets collectively. [Rare.]

A prodigious annual pageant, chariot, progress, and flourish of trumpetry.
Thackeray, Roundabout Papers, Thorns in the Cushion.

trumpet-shaped (trum'pet-shāpt), a. Formed like a trumpet; specifically, in cool, and bat, tubular with one end dilated, like a trumpet.

trumpet-shell (trum'pet-shēl), n. A shell of the genus Triton, as T. triton; any one of the Tritonidae; a triton; a sea-trumpet. These conchs attain a large size, some being a foot or more in length, and are used for blowing upon like trumpets. The name extends to any conchs which are or may be blown. See cuts under chank and Triton.

trumpet-tone (trum'pet-tōn), n. The sound or sounding of a trumpet; hence, a loud voice; generally in the plural; as, proclaim the truth in trumpet-tones.

trumpet-tongued (trum'pet-tungēd), a. Having a tongue vaciferous as a trumpet.

His virtues
Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against The deep damnation of his taking-off.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 19.

trumpet-tree (trum'pet-trē), n. A tree, Cecropia peltata, with hollow stem and very large peltate leaves. Also trumpetwood and snake-wood.

trumpet-vine (trum'pet-vīn), n. Same as trumpet-creeper.—Trumpet-vine seed-worm, the larva of Trumpet-vine seed-worm (Clydonopteron tectorum).

a, part of pod broken so as to show larva, natural size; b, larva, side view; c, pupa, ventral view; d, male moth expanded; e, female moth at rest; f, hole from which moth issued. Hair-lines show natural sizes.

a tortricid moth, Clydonopteron tectorum, which lives in the seed-pods of the trumpet-creeper, Tecoma radicans.

trumpetweed (trum'pet-wēd), n. 1. A large South African seaweed: same as sea-trumpet, 2.

—2. The joeey-weed or gravelroot, Eupatorium purpureum; so called from the use to which the stems are put by children.

They were hidden and shaded by the broad leaved horse- and trumpet-weeds in the fence-row.

The Century, XXXVI, 80.

3. Same as wild lettuce (b) (which see, under lettuce).

trumpetwood (trum'pet-wūd), n. Same as trumpet-tree.

trumpie (trum'pi), n. [Origin obscure.] A skua-gull or jigger. See cuts under skua and Stercorarius. [Orkneys.]

truncal (trung'kal), a. [< L. truncus, trunk, + -al.] Of or pertaining to the trunks or trunk of the body.

truncate (trung'kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. truncated, ppr. truncating. [< L. truncatus, pp. of truncare, cut off, reduce to a trunk; see trunk, v.] 1. To reduce in size or quantity by cutting; cut down; maim.

The examples are too often injudiciously truncated.
Johns v. But., Pret.

2. In crystal, to cut off an angle or edge by a plane section.

If a rhombhedron be positioned so as to rest upon one of its apices, the faces of one hexagonal prism would truncate the lateral edges of the rhombhedron, while the faces of the other hexagonal prism would truncate its lateral solid angles.

Encyc. Brit., XVI, 348.

Truncated cone or pyramid, a cone or a pyramid whose vertex is cut off by a plane parallel to its base; the frus-turn of a cone or pyramid. See cut under frustum.—Truncated cube, cuboctahedron, dodecahedron, icosahedron, icosidodecahedron, octahedron, tetrahedron. See the nouns.

truncate (trung'kät), v. [< L. truncatus, pp.; see the verb.] Truncated. Specifically—(a) In bot., appearing as if cut short at the tip by a transverse line, as the leaf of the tulip-tree, Liriodendron Tulipifera. (b) In zool., and anat., cut off; cut short; shortened by the removal of a part from either end. Especially—(1) Cut squarely off; cut straight across; hence, square, straight, or even at the end, as if so cut; as, the truncate tail of a fish or a bird. (2) In conch., broken off, as the apex of a conical or spiral shell; having lost the point of the spire.—Truncate elytra, those elytra which are cut off squarely at the apex, leaving the tip of the abdomen exposed. See Truncatipennes.

truncately (trung'kät-lī), adv. In a truncate manner; so as to be or to seem truncated.

truncation (trung-kä'shion), n. [< L. truncatio (n.), < L. truncare, pp. truncatus, cut off; see truncate.] 1. The act of truncating, or the state of being truncated; also, a truncated part.

Deceitful judgment of death or truncation of members. Præm., Huntley's Breviate (1637), p. 48.

2. In crystal., the replacement of an angle (or edge) by a crystalline face. In truncation proper, the replacing face makes equal angles with the adjacent faces; otherwise it is said to be oblique.

Truncatipennes (trung-kä-ti-pen'ez), n. pl. [N.L., < L. truncatus, cut off, + pennis, a wing.] An artificial group of caraboid beetles, corresponding to some extent with the family Brachinidae; so called from the truncation of the elytra in the typical forms. Latreille, truncatosinuate (trung-kä-tō-sin'ū-āt), a. [< L. truncatus, truncate, + sinuatus, sinuate.] In entom., truncate, with a sinus or slight inward curve on the edge of the truncation.

truncature (trung'kät-tür), n. [= lt. truncatura, < L. truncare, pp. truncatus; see truncate.] In zool., same as truncation.

trunch (trunch), n. [Also trunch; < OF. tronce, a fem. form of tronc, trunk; see trunk.] A stake or small post.

In the midst of them were four little trunches knocked into the ground, and small sticks laid over, on which they hung their pots, and what they had to seeth. Moor's Journal, in New England's Memorial, App., p. 352.

truncheon (trun'chon), n. [Formerly also truncheon; < ME. truncheon, truncheon, trunchyne, truncheon, trunchoun, < OF. trunçon, trunçon, a truncheon, a thick slice, a piece cut off, F. tronc (= Pr. tronço, troncho, truncon = Sp. troncon = lt. troncone), dim. of trunc, a stump, trunk; see trunk.] 1. A trunk, stock, or stump, as of a tree; hence, a tree the branches of which have been lopped off to produce rapid growth.

And the bowis grewen out of stockis or trunchons, and the trunchons or schaffis grewen out of the roote. Bp. Freuch, Repressor, i. 6.

2. The shaft of a spear or lance.

He loyneth on his feet with his trunchoun. Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1757.

They carry also the trunchons of their Lances with their Standards and Ensignes trailing along the ground. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 304.

3. A short staff; a club; a cudgel. Prompt. Parv., p. 504.

One with a broken trunchoun deals his blows. Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 612.

4. A baton or staff of authority; specifically, in her., the staff of the earl marshal of England. Two of these trunchons are borne saltierwise behind the escheator of the duke of Norfolk, who is hereditary earl marshal. See marshal's staff, under marshal.

Well, believe this, . . . The marshal's trunchoun, nor the judge's robe, Become them with one half so good a grace As mercy does. Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 61.

No sooner are the Three Strokes given, but out jumps Four Trunchion Officers from the lie Howel, and with a sort of ill mannerly Reverence receive him at the Gate. Quoted in Ashmole's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [11], 243.

truncheon (trun'chon), v. t. [< truncheon, n.] To beat or belabor with a truncheon or club; cudgel.

An captains were of my mind, they would truncheon you out, for taking their names upon you before you have earned them. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 154.

truncheoned (trun'chond), a. [< truncheon + -ed.] Furnished with a truncheon; hence, by extension, armed with a lance or other long-handled weapon.

truncheoneer (trun'chon-ēr'), n. [< truncheon + -eer.] Same as truncheoner.

truncheoner (trun'chon-ēr), n. [< truncheon + -er.] A person armed with a cudgel or staff.

I . . . hit that woman, who cried out "Clubs!" when I might see from far some forty truncheoners draw to her succor, which were the hope of the Strand, where she was quartered. Shak., 1 Hen. VIII., v. 4. 54.

trunchon, n. A Middle English spelling of truncheon.

trunchon, n. [Also trunchon; appar. connected with trunchon, trunchon.] An intestinal worm. Prompt. Parv., p. 504.

truncus (trung'kus), n.; pl. trunci (trun'si). [L.: see trunk.] 1. In bot., the stem or trunk of a tree.—2. In zool., the trunk; the axial part of an animal minus the head, limbs, and tail. See snout.—3. The main stem or trunk of a nerve or vessel of the body.—4. In entom., the thorax.—Extensor trunci. Same as erector spinae (which see, under erector).—Truncus arteriosus, an arterial trunk; the main trunk of the arterial system, in most cases more distinctively named. See pulmonary.

trundle (trun'dl), n. [A var. of trendle, trindle.] 1. A wheel small in diameter, but broad and massive so as to be adapted to support a heavy weight, as the wheel of a caster.—2. A small wheel or pinion having its teeth formed of cylinders or spindles; same as lantern-wheel.—3. One of the spindles of such a wheel.—4. A small carriage with low wheels; a truck.—5. A trundle-bed.—6. In her., a quill of thread for embroiderers, usually represented as a spool or reel, and the thread as of gold.

trundle (trun'dl), v.; pret. and pp. trundled, pp. trundling. [< OF. trundler, trundle; ult. a var. of trendle, trindle.] 1. Intrans. 1. To roll, as something on low wheels or casters; move or bowl along, as a round body; hence, to move with a rolling gait.

Betty. They are gone, sir, in great Anger. Petulant. Enough, let 'em trundle.

Congress, Way of the World, i. 9. Fast our Goodman trundled down the hill. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 203.

The four horses . . . seemed dwarfed by the blundering structure which trundled at their heels.

2. To revolve; twirl. J. Hawthorne, Dust, p. 11.

And there he threw the wash about, On both sides of the way, Just like unto a trundling mop. Conquer, John Gilpin.

II. trans. 1. To roll, or cause to roll, as a circular or spherical thing or as something on casters or low wheels; as, to trundle a hoop; to trundle a wheelbarrow; hence, to cause to move off with a rolling gait or pace.

She took an apple out of her pocket, And trundled it along the plain. Sir Hugh (Child's Ballads, III. 335).

They . . . who play at nine holes, and who trundle little round stones. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 1089.

I'll clap a pair of horses to your chair that shall trundle you off in a twinkling. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, ii.

Trundling the hoop is a pastime of uncertain origin. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 490.

2. To cause to revolve; twirl; as, to trundle a mop.

The English workman attains the same result by trundling the glass during reheating, and by constantly withdrawing it from the source of heat. Glass-making, p. 65.

trundle-bed (trun'dl-bed), n. A low bed moving on casters, and designed to be pushed under a high bed when not in use; a truckle-bed.

My wife and I in the high bed in our chamber, and Willet in the trundle-bed, which she desired to lie in, by us. Pepps, Diary, III. 269.

trundle-head (trun'dl-head), n. 1. The wheel that turns a millstone.—2. Naut., the drum-head of the lower member of a double capstan.—3. One of the end disks of a trundle-wheel.

trundle-shot (trun'dl-shot), n. A projectile consisting of a bar of iron sharpened at both ends and having near each end a ball of lead; so called because it turns in its flight.

trundletail (trun'dl-tāl), n. 1. A curled or curly tail, as a dog's.

Like a poor cur, clapping his trundle tail Betwixt his legs. Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, iii. 3.

2. A dog with such a tail. Formerly also grindletail.

Hound or spaniel, brach or lym, Or hobtail tyke or trundle-tail. Shak., Lear, iii. 6. 73.

Also trindletail.

trundle-wheel (trun'dl-hwēl), n. In mach., same as lantern-wheel.

trunk (trungk), n. [< ME. trunke, trunke = MD. tronck, D. tronk, < OF. (and F.) tronc, the trunk, stock, or body of a tree, a trunk or headless body, also the alms-box in churches, = Pr. tronc = Sp. Pg. It. tronco, < L. truncus, a stock, trunk, < truncus, OL. truncus, cut off, maimed, mutilated. Hence ult. (< L. truncus) F. truncate, trunch, trunchon, etc. Cf. Lith. trinka, block, log.] 1. The woody stem of a tree, from which the branches spring.

Lowie on the truncke as wounde him in the rynde, A lite humoure whenne oute of it is roune, With chaved cley the wounde ayen to bynde. Palsadius, Hushondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 212.

2. In arch., the shaft of a column; the part between the base and the capital. The term is sometimes used to signify the die or body of a pedestal. See cut under column.—3. The main part or stem of a branching organ or system of organs, considered apart from its ramifications; as, the trunk of an artery, a vein, or a nerve; the trunk of a zoöphyte or coral. Also trunks.—4. The human body or that of an animal without the head and limbs, and, in animals, the tail, or considered apart from these; in literary use, the body. In entomology the trunk is the body exclusive of the head, legs, wings, and elytra: the word was used by the older entomologists in describing those insects which have the thorax closely united to the abdomen, as the beetles and grasshoppers. The trunk was said to be distinct when it was separated from the head. Some entomologists, following Fabricius, restrict trunk to the thorax (in which sense also truncus).

To hold opinion with Pythagoras, That souls of animals infuse themselves Into the trunks of men. Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 133.

What new friend have I found, that dares deliver This laden trunk from his afflictions? Fletcher, Double Marriage, iv. 3.

Now his troops Covered that earth they had fought on with their trunks. E. Jonson, Catiline, v. 6.

I'll hazard My head, I'll work the senseless trunk t' appear To him as it had got a second being. Massinger, Duke of Milan, v. 2.

5. A receptacle with stiff sides and a hinged cover or upper part, used especially for carrying clothes, toilet articles, etc., for a journey. To lie like pawns locked up in chests and trunks. Shak., K. John, v. 2. 141.

Then for to show I make nae lie, Look ye my trunk, and ye will see. Lord Dingwall (Child's Ballads, I. 292).

John soon after arrives with her trunks, and is installed in her school. W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 219.

6. In fishing, an iron hoop with a bag, used to catch crustaceans. E. H. Knight.—7. A tube of various kinds and uses. (a) A speaking-tube.

This fellow waits on him now in tennis court socks, or slippers soled with wool; and they talk each to other in a trunk. E. Jonson, Epicene, i. 1.

Are there no trunks to convey secret voices? Shirley, Traitor, iii. 1.

(b) A telescope.

Oh, by a trunk! I know it, a thing no bigger than a flute-case: a neighbor of mine, a spectacle-maker, has drawn the moon through it at the bore of a whistle, and made it as great as a drum-head twenty times, and brought it within the length of this room to me, I know not how often. E. Jonson, World in the Moon.

(c) A pea- or bean-shooter; a long tube through which peas, pellets, etc., were driven by the force of the breath.

While he shot sugar-plums at them out of a trunk which they were to take up. Hovell, Letters, i. iii. 87.

In a shooting trunk, the longer it is, to a certain limit, the swifter and more forcibly the air drives the pellet. Ray.

(d) A boxed passage for air to or from a blast-apparatus or blowing-engine; an air-shaft. (e) A boxed passage up or down which grain or flour is conveyed in an elevator or mill. (f) A box-tube used to send attle or rubbish out of a mine, or to convey coal to a wagon or heap, broken quartz from a mill to the stamps, etc. (g) A long narrow trough which was formerly used in Cornwall in dressing copper- and tin-mines. (h) A wooden box or pipe of square section in which air is conveyed in a mine. (Bristol, Eng., coal-field.) (i) A kibble. (Wiltshire, Eng.)

8. A trough to convey water from a race to a water-wheel, etc.; a flume; a penstock.—9. In trunk-engines, a section of pipe attached to a piston and moving longitudinally with it, its diameter being sufficient to allow one end of the connecting-rod to be attached to the crank and the other end directly to the piston, thus dispensing with an intermediate rod; used in marine engines for driving propellers, also in some stationary steam-engines, and extensively in calorific engines.—10. A proboscis; a long snout; especially, the proboscis of the elephant; less frequently, the proboscis of other animals, as butterflies, flies, mosquitos and other gnats, and certain mollusks and worms. See the applications of proboscis.—11. pl. Trunk-hose.

He look'd, in his old velvet trunk
And his slic'd Spanish Jerkin, like Don John.
Beau. and Fl., Captain, iii. 3.

Red striped cotton stockings, with full trunks, dotted red and black.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, III. 120.

12. In hat-manuf., the tube or directing passage in a machine for forming the bodies of hats, which confines the air-currents, and guides the fibers of fur from the picker to the cone. E. H. Knight, —13. pl. Same as troll-madam or pigeonholes. Cotgrave, 1611.

trunk (trungk), v. t. [ME. trunken, < OF. (and F.) troncuer = Sp. Pg. troncar, troncar = It. troncare, trancare, < L. trancare, lop, maim, mutilate, < truncus, lopped, maimed: see trunk, and cf. truncate.] 1*t.* To lop off; curtail; truncate.

Eke sum her aged vynes wol repare,
And trunk hem of alle hire above grounde.

Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 107.

2. To separate, as tin or copper ore, from the worthless veinstone, by the use of the trunk.

What [copper ore] runs off the hindmost part of the pit . . . is slimy, and must be trunked, biddled, and tozed as the slimy tin.
Bortius, Nat. Hist. Cornwall.

trunkal (trung'kal), n. Same as truncat.

trunk-alarm (trungk'alärm'), n. A device for sounding an alarm when a trunk is opened.

trunkback (trungk'bak), n. The trunk-turtle or leatherback. See cut under leatherback.

trunk-bearer (trungk'bär'ér), n. Any probosciferous gastropod. P. P. Carpenter.

trunk-brace (trungk'bräs), n. One of the straps or tapes which support the lid of a trunk when raised, and prevent it from falling backward.

trunk-breeches (trungk'brich'ez), n. pl. Same as trunk-hose. Irring, Knickerbocker, p. 321.

trunk-cabin (trungk'kah'in), n. Naut., a cabin partly below and partly above the spar-deck.

trunk-case (trungk'käs), n. In entom., that part of the integument of a pupa which covers the thorax.

trunked (trungkt), a. [< trunk + -ed.] 1. Having a trunk, in any sense: generally used in compounds.

Strong and well-trunked Trees of all sorts.

Huvel, Vocabl. Forrest (ed. 1645), p. 32.

2. In her.: (a) Having a trunk: used only when the trunk is of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing: as, a tree vert trunked azure. (b) Couped of all its branches and roots—that is, having them cut short so as to show only stumps. (c) Same as caloshed.—3. Truncated; beheaded.

The trunked beast fast bleeding did him fowly dight.
Spenser, F. Q., II. v. 4.

trunk-engine (trungk'en'jin), n. See engine.

trunk-fish (trungk'fish), n. Any ostracodont.

trunkful (trungk'ful), n. [< trunk + -ful.] As much as a trunk will hold.

trunk-line (trungk'lin), n. The main line, as of a railway or canal, from which branch-lines diverge.

trunkmail (trungk'mäl), n. Same as trunk, 5. Sometimes trunkmail. Scott, Monastery, xv.

trunk-nail (trungk'näl), n. A nail with a large, ornamental, convex head, used for trunks and for cheap coffins.

trunk-road (trungk'röd), n. A highway; a main road.

Englebourne was situated on no trunk road.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, II. xxiii.

trunk-sleeve (trungk'slöv), n. A sleeve of which a part, usually that covering the upper arm, is puffed or made very full and stiff: so called from analogy with trunk-hose.

Tai. [Reads.] "With a trunk sleeve."

Giri. I confess two sleeves.

Shak., T. of the S., iv. 3. 142.

trunk-stay (trungk'stä), n. A trunk-brace.

trunk-turtle (trungk'tër'tl), n. 1. A species of tortoise, Testudo arcuata.—2. The leatherback, Dermochelys (or Sphargis) coriacea. See cut under leatherback.

trunk-work (trungk'wërk), n. Work involving concealment or secrecy, as by means of a trunk.

This has been some stair-work, some trunk-work, some behind-door work.

Shak., W. T., iii. 3. 75.

trunnell, n. An obsolete variant of trundle.

trunnel (trun'el), n. A variant of trunnail.

trunnion (trun'yön), n. [< OF. trogon, trugnon, the trunk or stump of a tree, F. trogon, a stump, stalk, core, < trone, tron, a stock, trunk: see trunk, and cf. trunchcon.] The F. word for 'trunnion' is tourillon. 1. One of the cylindrical projections on the sides of a cannon, cast or forged in one piece with the cannon itself, which support it on its carriage. In the United States artillery service the diameter of the trunnion in smooth-bore guns has generally been equal to the diameter of the bore. See cut under howitzer.

2. In steam-engines, a hollow gudgeon on each side of an oscillating cylinder, which supports the cylinder, and through which steam is received and exhausted.

trunnioned (trun'yond), a. [< trunnion + -ed.] Provided with trunnions, as the cylinder of an oscillating steam-engine.

trunnion-lathe (trun'yön-läth), n. A lathe especially designed for forming the trunnions of ordnance or of oscillating cylinders. E. H. Knight.

trunnion-plate (trun'yön-plät), n. 1. A raised rim forming a shoulder around the trunnion on the side of the gun.—2. A plate of iron covering the top of a wooden gun-carriage on each side, and carried down into the recess for the trunnion so as to take the weight of the gun, and prevent it from crushing the wood. See cut under gun-carriage.

trunnion-ring (trun'yön-ring), n. In old-fashioned cannon, a ring cast solid with the piece and near the trunnions, usually between them and the muzzle. See cut under cannon.

trunnion-sight (trun'yön-sit), n. A front sight placed on the rimbase of a cannon. A lug is usually left on the curved surface to form a base for the sight.

trunnion-valve (trun'yön-valv), n. A valve attached to or included in the trunnions of an oscillating-cylinder steam-engine so as to be reciprocated by the motions of the cylinder.

Trupialis (trö-pi-ä'lis), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1850, after Merrem, 1826), < F. troupiale: see troopial.] A genus of Neotropical Icteridae, of the subfamily Sturnellinae, and very near Sturnella itself, as T. militaris. These birds closely resemble the common field-larks or meadow-sparrows of the United States, but have a brick-red color on the parts which are yellow in the latter. The name was originally an exact synonym of Aegialitis; in its present sense it is synonymous with Leistes.

trushi, v. An obsolete form of truss.

trusion (trö'zhön), n. [As if < L. trusio(n-), < trudere, pp. trusus, push: see thrust. Cf. intrusion.] The act of pushing or thrusting. [Now rare.]

Engines and machines work by trusion or pulsion.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, v. § 5.

By attraction we do not here understand what is improperly, though vulgarly, called so in the operations of drawing, sucking, pumping, &c., which is really pulsion and trusion.

Bentley, Boyle Lectures, Sermon vii.

truss (trus), v. [< ME. trussen, trushen = MHG. trossen, < OF. trusser, trosser, troussier, torser, F. trosser = Pr. trossar = Sp. trazar, pack, bind, tie, tuck up, truss, = It. torciare, twist, wrap, tie, *< ML. torciare, < L. tortus, pp. of torquere, twist: see tort. Cf. torch, < ML. torlat, a torch, orig. a piece of twisted rope. Hence ult. truss, n., trosser, trossers, trossseau.] 1. Trans. 1. To tie up; pack in a bundle; bundle: often with up.

It was trussed up in his wallet.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 681.

Within fewe dayes after [Niueca] commanded them to Peter Martyr (C. in Eden's First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 112].

You might haue truss'd him and all his Apparell into an Eccleskine.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV. (folio 1623), iii. 2. 350.

2. To tie, bind, or fasten: sometimes with up.

And [they] hadde the heed of the Geaunte trussed at Beduiers saddle by the heire. Morlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 60.

Then Beauty stept before the bar, whose breast and neck were bare.

With hair truss'd up.

A Praise of Mistress Ryce (Arber's Eng. Garner, l. 38).

3. Specifically, to adjust and draw closely the garment or garments of, as a person; also, to draw tight and tie, as laces or points.

The Consul Silla, when he sawe Julius Caesar, being a young man euill trussed, and worse girt, . . . said vnto all those of his band, beware of ill girt youth, that although he appeareth to be such, yet this is he that shal tyrannize the cite of Rome, and be the ruine of my house.

Guicciardi, Letters (tr. by Helwies, 1577), p. 165.

Enter Allwit in one of Sir Walter's suits, and Davy trussing him.

Middleton, Chaste Maid, ii. 3.

4. To seize and hold firmly; seize and carry off: said especially of birds of prey.

Brave falcons that dare truss a fowl
Much greater than themselves.

Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois, iii. 1.

5. To make fast, as the wings of a fowl to the body preparatory to cooking it; skewer.

The second course was two ducks trussed up in the form of fiddles.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii. 2.

6. To hang: usually with up.

The Jury such, the Judge unjust:

Sentence was said I should be truss'd.

Gascogne (Arber's Eng. Garner, l. 63).

I have been provost-marshal twenty years,

And have truss'd up a thousand of these rascals.

Beau. and Fl., Little French Lawyer, v. 3.

7. In building, to furnish with a truss; suspend or support by a truss.—8*t.* To drive off; rout.

The Brehaigns went out thaim fast trussing,

Wheroff Brehaigne was astoned sore,

And diffendly thaim feblly enuore.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 2154.

II.† intrans. 1. To pack; make ready.—2.

To go; be off; begone, as one who has been sent packing.

He has nowher wel-come for his mony tales,
Bote ourn-ail i-hunted and hote [ordered] to trusse.

Piers Plowman (A), ll. 191.

truss (trus), n. [< ME. trasse = MHG. trasse, G. tross, < OF. (and F.) trosser = Pr. trossa = Sp. traja = Pg. trouxa, a bundle, pack; from the verb.] 1. A bundle; pack.

Undir his hede no pilowe was,
But in the stede a trusse of gras.

Boon. of the Rose, l. 1004.

The halfe of them caryng harquebushes, and the other halfe Turkish bowes, with their trusses of arrowes.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 113.

He took his truss and came away with them in the boat.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, l. 376.

Specifically.—2. A bundle of hay or straw.

(a) A quantity of hay tied together, and having a definite weight, usually stated at 50 pounds, but, according to a statute of George III., 56 pounds of old hay or 60 pounds of new. Statutes of George II. legalized local trusses of 36 pounds in London and 7 pounds in Bristol.

(b) A bunch of straw tied together, and generally stated at 36 pounds, which is, however, merely the London truss of hay.

(c) A quantity of hay cut by a special knife out of the mass of a haystack, approximately cubical in form.

3. In hort., a compact terminal flower-cluster of any kind, as an umbel, corymb, or spike.—

4. In surg., an appliance consisting of a belt or an elastic steel spring encircling the body, to which is attached a pad, used in cases of rupture to hinder the descent of the parts, or to prevent an increase in size of an irreducible hernia.—

5. A garment worn in the sixteenth century and previously: probably so called from being laced closely to the person.

Thus put he on his arming truss, fair shoes upon his feet,
About him a mandilion

Chapman, Iliad, x. 119.

Puts off his palmer's weed unto his truss, which bore

The stains of ancient arms

Drayton.

6*t. pl.* Trousers; tight-fitting drawers. See trouse, trousers.

We diuide Christ's garment amongst vs in so manie peeces, and of the vesture of saluation make some of us babies and apes cootes, others straight trusses and diuells breeches, some gally gascynes, or a shipman's hose.

Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 20.

Gasp, 't must be close.
George, As . . . a pair of trusses to an Irishman's buttocks.
Shirley, Love Tricks, i. 1.

7. In building, a stiff frame; a combination of timbers, of iron parts, or of timbers and iron-work, so arranged as to constitute an unyielding frame. The simplest example of a truss is the principal or main couple of a roof (see cuts under roof and queen-post), in which the tie-beam is suspended in the middle by the king-post to the apex of the angle formed by the meeting of the rafters. The feet of the rafters being tied together by the beam, and being thus incapable of yielding in the direction of their length, their apex becomes a fixed point, to which the beam is trussed or tied up to prevent its sagging, and to prevent the rafters from sagging struts are inserted. There are other forms of truss suited to different purposes, but the conditions are the same in all—namely, the establishing of fixed points to which the tie-beam is trussed. Two points of attachment are sometimes substituted for the single one, and two suspending posts are required; these are called queen-posts, and the truss is called a queen-post truss. The principle of the truss is of very wide application in bridge building. Trusses of various forms are much used in iron-construction.

8. In arch, a large corbel or modillion supporting a mural monument or any object projecting from the face of a wall. See crasset, i. (a), with cut.—9. In ship-building, a short piece of carved work fitted under the taffrail: chiefly used in small ships.—10. A heavy iron fitting by which the lower yards of vessels are secured to the lower mast and on which they swing. Formerly yards were kept in place by trusses of rope which passed round the yard and mast and were kept taut by truss-tackles which were hooked to the truss-pendants.—Howe truss, a beam-truss having its oblique members in compression and with vertical tie-rods. The counterbraces pass between the main obliques.—Linville truss, a beam-truss of which the web-members are composed of vertical posts and diagonal rods or bars extending from the head of one post to the foot of the second post beyond.

McCallum inflexible arch-truss, a beam-truss with an arched upper chord, and inclined struts extending from it to the abutment end of the lower chord. It has posts and diagonals, the distance between the former diminishing from the middle toward the ends. See fifth cut under bridge.—Mocmain truss. See moenain.—Pratt truss, a beam-truss having vertical posts and inclined tension members. See fig. a, above.—Rider truss. See rider.—Truss-arch bridge. See trussed-arch bridge, under bridge.

truss (trus), n. [<trass, n.] Bunchy; stumpy; stocky; round and thick.

The tiger-cat is about the bigness of a bull-dog, with short legs, and a truss body, shaped much like a mastiff.
Bamford, Voyages, an. 1676.

truss-beam (trus'ben), n. A wooden beam reinforced by a tie-rod, or a compound wooden beam composed of two or more wooden members and reinforced by means of a tie-rod, or a built-up beam of iron arranged in the form of a truss. The most simple form is a single piece of timber having an iron tie-rod on the under side secured at a, with cast-iron truss; b, with wrought-iron tension-rod.

each end of the beam, serving to resist the strain of tension on the under side of the beam when carrying a load. The lower beams of a railroad passenger-car are a good example. Another and less common form is a wooden beam having cast-iron struts to resist the strain of compression. Several beams united and reinforced by a tie-rod may form a compound truss-beam. Iron truss-beams have usually only tie-rods of wrought-iron, with sometimes box beams for the upper chord. Truss beams are used in car building in tools of all kinds, and for short bridges. See beam truss and bridge.

truss-block (trus'bloke), n. A block between a truss-rod and the compression-member of a trussed beam. It keeps the two at their proper distance apart.

truss-bridge (trus'brij), n. A bridge which depends for its stability upon an application of the principle of the truss. See bridge.

trussed (trusht), a. [<trass + -ed]. 1. Provided with some form of truss; as, a trussed roof; a trussed beam.—2. In law, same as chast; 10 c; used of a bird. Trussed-arch bridge. See bridge. Trussed girder. See arch, i. 2. trussel (trus'el), n. [ME. trussel, <OF. trussel, F. trousseau, a bundle, dim. of trousse, a bundle; see truss, and cf. trousseau.] A bundle, trussel² (trus'l), n. Same as tristle.

trusseltree (trus'el-trê), n. Same as tristle-tree.

trusser (trus'er), n. One who or that which trusses.

Hay and straw trussers. The Engineer, LXVII. 292.

trusses, n. pl. See truss, 6.

truss-hoop (trus'hôp), n. In coopering, a temporary hoop which may be placed around a barrel and tightened, to draw the staves snugly together or to hold them in position while one that has become broken or decayed is being replaced. E. H. Knight.

trussing (trus'ing), n. [Verbal n. of truss, v.] In building, the timbers, etc., which form a truss.—Diagonal trussing, in ship-building, a particular method of binding a vessel internally or externally, or both, by means of a series of wooden or iron braces laid diagonally on the framing from one end of the ship to the other.

trussing-bed (trus'ing-bed), n. A bed which could be packed, as in a chest, for traveling. Hallivell.

trussing-machine (trus'ing-ma-shên'), n. In coopering, a machine for forcing truss-hoops upon casks. E. H. Knight.

truss-piece (trus'pîs), n. A filling piece between the compartments of a framed truss. E. H. Knight.

truss-plank (trus'plangk), n. In a railway passenger-car, a wide piece of timber fastened on the inside of the car to the posts of the frame directly above the sills.

truss-rod (trus'rod), n. A tie-rod fastened to the ends of a beam and bearing against a king-post at the middle, or against queen-posts or truss-blocks between the rod and the beam at intermediate points. It serves to resist deflection of the beam.

truss-tackle (trus'tak'l), n. A tackle formerly used with rope trusses for lower yards to truss the yard close in to the mast.

trust¹ (trust), n. and a. [Also, in a sense now differentiated, trust, q. v.; < ME. trust, trust, also trust, trust, not found in AS., and in part of Scand. origin; = OFries. trāst, comfort = *MD. Reliance on the veracity, integrity, justice, friendship, or other virtue or sound principle of another; a firm reliance on promises or on laws or principles; confidence; belief.

Always has full trust and believe in God our Sovereign Lord Manderiville, Travels, p. 167.

Gracery! for on you is all my trust.

Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 1305.

I hope a true and plain relation of my misfortunes may be of use and warning to credulous maids, never to put too much trust in deceitful men.

Swift, Story of the Injured Lady.

There did not seem a sufficient number of men worthy of trust to assist the king with their councils, or fill with any degree of dignity the places that were vacant.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 121.

2. Confident expectation; assured anticipation; dependence upon something future or contingent as if present or actual; hope.

To desperation turn my trust and hope!

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 228.

His trust was with th' Eternal to be deem'd Equal in strength.

Milton, P. L., ii. 46.

Sustained and soothed By an unflinching trust, approach thy grave, Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Bryant, Thanatopsis.

3. That on which one relies or in which he confides; ground of reliance, confidence, or hope.

Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust.

Ps. xl. 4.

Who in the fear of God didst bear

The sword of power, a nation's trust.

Bryant, Abraham Lincoln.

4. Credit. (a) Mere reliance on the character or reputation of a person or thing, without investigation or evidence; preceded by on: as, to take opinions or statements on trust.

For we live in an age so sceptical that, as it determines little, so it takes nothing from authority on trust.

Dryden, Def. of Epil. to 2d pt. Cong. of Granada.

Some . . . taking things upon trust, misemploy their power of assent by lazily enslaving their minds to the dictates and dominion of others.

Locke, Human Understanding, i. iv. § 22.

(b) Confidence in the ability and intention of one who does not pay ready money to pay at some definite or indefinite time in the future: as, to buy or sell on trust.

Ev'n such is time; which takes in trust

Our youth, our joys, our all we have!

And pays us nought but age and dust.

Raleigh, Ellis's Spec. of Early Eng. Poetry, II. 224.

I fear you must be forced, like the rest of your sisters, to run in trust, and pay for it out of your wages.

Swift, Advice to Servants (Waiting-Maid).

5. In law: (a) A confidence reposed in a person by making him the nominal owner of property which he is to hold, use, or dispose of for the benefit of another. (b) The right on the part of such other to enjoy the use or the profits or to require a disposal of the property for his benefit. (c) The relation between persons and property which arises when the legal ownership is given to one person, called the trustee, and the beneficial enjoyment or advantages of ownership are given or reserved to another, the cestui que trust or beneficiary. Property is sometimes said to be held in trust when the possession of it is intrusted to one person while another remains both legal and beneficial owner; but this is not technically a trust, although the person so intrusted in some respects may be held to the same duty and accountability as a trustee, and is sometimes spoken of as such.

The fictitious entities characterised by the two abstract terms trust and condition are not subalternate but disparate. To speak with perfect precision, we should say that he who is invested with a trust is, on that account, spoken of as being invested with a condition: viz. the condition of a trustee.

Bentham, Introduct. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 26, note.

6. That which is committed or intrusted to one, as for safe-keeping or use. (a) That which has been committed to one's care for profitable use or for safe-keeping, of which an account must be rendered.

Although the advantages one man possesseth more than another may be called his property with respect to other men, yet with respect to God they are only a trust.

Swift.

The English doctrine that all power is a trust for the public good [was] . . . making rapid progress.

Macaulay, Walpole's Letters.

Public office is a public trust.

Dorman B. Eaton, in Cyc. Polit. Science, I. 479 (1881).

(b) Something confided to one's faith; a charge given or received in confidence; something which one is bound in duty and in honor to keep inviolate; a duty incumbent on one.

To violate the sacred trust of silence

Deposited within thee. Milton, S. A., I. 428.

Humility obliges no Man to desert his Trust, to throw up his Privilege, and prove false to his Character.

Jeremy Collier, Short View (ed. 1698), p. 137.

"If men accept trusts they must fulfill them, my dear," cries the master of the house. Thackeray, Philip, xv.

7. Specifically, in mod. com. usage, an organization for the control of several corporations under one direction by the device of a transfer by the stockholders in each corporation of at least a majority of the stock to a central committee or board of trustees, who issue in return to such stockholders respectively certificates showing in effect that, although they have parted with their stock and the consequent voting power, they are still entitled to dividends or to share in the profits—the object being to enable the trustees to elect directors in all the corporations, to control and suspend at pleasure the work of any, and thus to economize expenses, regulate production, and defeat competition. In a looser sense the term is applied to any combination of establishments in the same line of business for securing the same ends by holding the individual interests of each subservient to a common authority for the common interests of all. It is against public policy for a stockholder to divest himself of his voting power; hence such a transfer of stock if made is revocable at the pleasure of the maker. So far as the object of such a combination is shown to be the control of prices and the prevention of competition in the necessities or conveniences of life, it is held a criminal act upon the principles which rendered engrossing and forestalling punishable; and a corporation which by corporate act surrenders its powers to the control of a trust thereby affords ground for a forfeiture of its charter by the state.

8. The state of being confided in and relied on; the state of one to whom something is intrusted.

I do profess to be no less than I seem; to serve him truly that will put me in trust.

Shak., Lear, i. 4. 15.

It seems when he was deputy in Ireland, not long before, he had been much wronged by one he left in trust with his affairs.

Erskine, Diary, Oct. 27, 1675.

9. The state of being confided to another's care or guard; charge.

His seal'd commission, left in trust with me,

Both speak sufficiently he's gone to travel.

Shak., Pericles, i. 3. 13.

10. Keeping; care.

That which is committed to thy trust. 1 Tim. vi. 20.

11†. Trustworthiness.

A man he is of honesty and trust.

Shak., Othello, i. 3. 285.

In suits which a man doth not well understand, it is good to refer them to some friend of trust and judgment.

Bacon, Suitors (ed. 1887).

There is not
In any court of Christendom a man
For quality or trust more absolute.

Ford, Love's Sacrifice, l. 2.

Active or special trust (in Scots law called accessory trust), a trust in which the trustee is clothed with some actual power of disposition or management which cannot be properly exercised without his having the legal estate and right of actual possession; as distinguished from a simple trust, naked trust, or passive trust (in Scots law called proprietary trust), where the trustee is intended to be merely a figurehead to hold the apparent title, leaving the use or control to the beneficiary. Naked or passive trusts in land are now generally superseded by the rule (introduced originally by the statute of uses (see use), and extended in the United States by statutes of trusts) that, when a person attempts to create such a trust, no estate vests in the trustee, but the entire and absolute estate vests in the intended beneficiary. — Breach of trust. See breach. — Charitable Trusts Acts. See charitable. — Constructive trust, the legal relation similar to an express trust which arises upon circumstances which ought in equity to be dealt with as if there were a trust, irrespective of whether one was intended or not; thus, where a guardian transfers property of the ward without receiving an equivalent, the person receiving it may be made accountable as holding in trust for the ward by construction of law, irrespective of whether he intended to receive it for the ward's benefit or not. — Declaration of trust. See declaration. — Deed of trust. See deed. — Executed trust. (a) Technically, an express trust the objects and administration of which are so fully designated as to require no further act on the part of the creator of the trust to define the duty of the trustee, as distinguished from an executory trust, or one in which the instrument of creation reserves the declaration of the uses or some part thereof for further instructions. (b) A trust is also said to be executed when the trustee has performed his entire duty. (c) When the instrument creating a trust in land has the effect by virtue of the statute of uses of vesting the entire estate in the intended beneficiary, the trust is said to be executed by the statute. — Express trust, a trust which is created or declared in express terms, and usually, but not always, in writing, as distinguished from an implied trust, or one the existence of which is inferred from the conduct of the parties or the circumstances of the case. The phrase implied trust is sometimes loosely, but not improperly, applied to those constructive trusts in which there may be circumstances indicating that perhaps the parties intended a trust rather than a fraud. — Implied trust. See express trust. — In trust, as a trust; as a charge; for safe-keeping, or for the use of another to whom account is due. — Loan and trust company. See bank, 4. — Naked trust, a nominal or ostensible trust; a trust in which the trustee is not clothed with the right of possession or control. By the statute of uses, such trusts in land are executed, that is to say, the legal title is declared by law to be in the beneficiary, who has the right of possession and control, notwithstanding the contrary intent of the instrument creating the trust. — On trust, on credit; without present payment or security for payment; as, to buy on trust; to conduct one's business on trust. — Passive trust. See active trust. — Private trusts. See private. — Proprietary trust. See active trust. — Public trust. See public. — Resulting trust, a trust which is conclusively implied by rules of law from given circumstances; more specifically, that species of constructive trust which arises in favor of one who pays the price for real property on its conveyance to another. When one person obtained title to land for a consideration paid by another, the courts of chancery thus held the former to be a trustee of the property for the latter. By statute in many of the United States this result is precluded, except where the person paying is ignorant that the title is so taken, or where the claim to reach the property is made by his creditors. — Special trust. See special. — Spendthrift trust, a trust authorizing the trustees to pay the income for life to one person, the principal being given over to another on his death; so called under systems of law, as in Pennsylvania, which protect such income against claims of creditors. — To run in trust, to run in debt; get credit. Webster. — Trust certificate, one of the certificates issued by the committee of trustees formed for the control of several corporations, showing the interest on profits accepted by one who was a stockholder in one of such corporations, upon surrendering his stock. See def. 7. — Trust deed, a conveyance in trust. More specifically:—(a) A deed by a debtor conveying property to a person as trustee for payment of his debts. (b) A deed conveying property to a creditor in trust to sell and pay himself and restore the residue: a kind of mortgage. — Trust estate, an estate under the management of a trustee or trustees; or an estate given to be held in trust. — Trust ex maleficio, any constructive trust arising by reason of wrong-doing or intentional fraud on the part of the person charged as trustee, as where an attorney obtains title to his client's property in violation of duty. = Syn. 1 and 2. Faith, credence, assurance, dependence, expectation.

II. a. Held in trust: as, trust property; trust money. trust¹ (trust), v. [Also, in a sense now differentiated, tryst, q. v.; < ME. trusten, trosten, also tristen, trysten, tresten, traisten (< Icel.) = OFries. trāsta = MD. Shak., T. of the S., iv. 2. 67.

3. To intrust: with with before the object confided.

I will rather trust a Flemming with my butter.
Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 2. 316.
Whom with your power and fortune, sir, you trust,
Now to suspect is vain.
Dryden.

4. To commit, consign, or allow with confidence; permit to be in some place, position, or company, or to do some particular thing, without misgiving or fear of consequences; as, to trust one's self to another's guidance.

I wonder men dare trust themselves with men.
Shak., T. of A., i. 2. 41.
Fool'd and beguiled; by him thou, I, by thee,
To trust thee from my side. Milton, P. L., x. 881.
I did not choose to trust these letters with our boatman.
Bruce, Source of the Nile, l. 103.

Merchants were not willing to trust precious cargoes to any custody but that of a man-of-war. Macaulay.

5. To give credit to; supply with goods or something of value in the expectation of future payment.

He that is a great gamester may be trusted for a quarter's board at all times. Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 124.
It was your old mercer Shortyard, that you turned off a year ago, because he would trust you no longer.
Vanbrugh, Journey to London, iv. 1.

6. To entertain a lively hope; feel sure; expect confidently; followed by a clause.

And we trusted to have reched to ye Yle of Melyda for our herboroughe the same nyght, but the wynde was so searse that we were put bak to the Yle of Medza.
Sir R. Gygylforde, Fylgrymage, p. 71.
Oh yet we trust that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, liv.

II. intrans. 1. To repose confidence; place faith or reliance; rely: with on or in.

But who may beste bigile if hym liste

trust². An obsolete spelling of trussed, preterit and past participle of trust.

trustee (trus-tē'), n. [< *trust*¹ + -ee¹.] 1. A person to whom property or funds have been committed in the belief and trust that he will hold and apply the same for the benefit of those who are entitled, according to an expressed intention, either by the parties themselves, or by the deed, will, settlement, or arrangement of another; also, by extension, a person held accountable as if he were expressly a trustee in law. Compare guardian, 2.

I have made over all my Wealth to these Honest Gentlemen; they are my Trustees.
Etherege, Love in a Tub, Epil.
Philip's mother's trustee was answerable to Philip for his property.
Thackeray, Philip, xvi.
Their [the clergy's] gigantic wealth was in a great degree due to the legacies of those who regarded them as the trustees of the poor. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 89.

2. In the United States, a person in whose hands the effects of another are attached in a trustee process (see the phrase below). — Trustee Churches Act. See church. — Trustee of bankrupt's estate. Same as assignee in bankruptcy (which see, under assignee). — Trustee process, a species of attachment of rights of action of a debtor or property belonging to him in the hands of a third person, by making the debtor to him or the third person, as the case may be, a party to the proceedings, so as to charge him with the money or the property as a trust for the attaching creditor of the debtor (or equivalent to the process known in English law as foreign attachment). It is called trustee process in some jurisdictions, as distinguishing it from attachments which go to the length of taking the said property or fund into the actual custody of the law by seizure.

trustee (trus-tē'), v. t. [< trustee, n.] To attach by a trustee process. See trustee, n., 3. trusteeship (trus-tē'ship), n. [< trustee + -ship.] The office or functions of a trustee.
truster (trus-tēr), n. [< *trust*¹ + -er¹.] 1. One who trusts or relies, or who accepts a thing as true; a believer.

Nor shall you do mine ear that violence
To make it truster of your own report Against yourself. Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 172.

2. One who trusts or gives credit; a creditor.

Bankrupts, hold fast;
Rather than render back, out with your knives,
And cut your trusters' throats!
Shak., T. of A., iv. 1. 10.

3. In Scots law, one who grants a trust deed; the correlative of trustee.

trustful (trust'fūl), a. [< *trust*¹ + -ful.] 1. Full of trust; confiding; as, a person of a trustful disposition.

Consider, again, how much that is loveable and praise-worthy and energetic for good in individuals springs from the trustful and affectionate element in our nature.
H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 263.

2. Worthy of trust; faithful; trusty. Stanishurst.

trustfully (trust'fūl-i), adv. In a trustful manner.

Shak., All's Well, iii. 6. 16.

II. u.; pl. trusties (-tiz). A trusty person; specifically, a well-behaved and trustworthy convict to whom special privileges are granted.

By far the greater number of criminals confined in the jails of the far West are there for a class of offenses peculiar to the country. They are men dangerous in one direction, perhaps, but generally not depraved. The trusties are often domesticated upon ranches near the town, and apparently are unwatched, and on the best of terms with the ranchman's family. The Century, XXXVII. 418.

trut, interj. [ME. trut, also ptrupt, ptvat, < OF. trut, an interj. of contempt. Cf. tut.] An interjection of contempt. Prompt. Parv., p. 415.

truth (trōth), n. [Also, in a form now differentiated, truth, q. v.; < ME. truthe, treuthe, træthe, treuthe, treuthe, treuthe, etc., also trouthe, trawthe, < AS. træowtha, træowth (træowth, træowth) (= OLG. triawida*, in comp., = leel, triggith), truth, faith; with formative -th, < treow, true: see true.] 1. The state or character of being true; truthness. (a) Conformity of thought with fact; conformity of a judgment, statement, or belief with the reality; exact correspondence of subjective and objective relations.

All admit that by truth is understood a harmony, an agreement, a correspondence between our thought and that which we think about. This definition we owe to the schoolmen. "Veritas intellectus," says Aquinas, "est adæquatio intellectus et rei, secundum quod intellectus dicit esse quod est, vel non esse quod non est."

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, xxvii.

In common life we call truth the agreement between an object and our conception of the object. We thus presuppose an object to which our conception must conform. In the philosophical sense of the word, on the other hand, truth may be described, in a general and one-sided way, as the agreement of the subject-matter of thought with itself.

Hegel, Logic (tr. by Wallace), p. 43.

(b) The state of being made true or exact; exact conformity to a model, rule, or plan; accuracy of adjustment; exact adaptation.

Moughs, to go true, depend much on the truth of the iron-work

Mortimer, Husbandry.

Most gun-stocks are twisted over—that is to say, the toe of the butt is more out of truth with the barrels than the heel.

W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 432.

(c) In the fine arts, the proper and correct representation of any object in nature, or of whatever subject may be under treatment; specifically, in arch., avoidance of defects in construction or decoration, as of non-concordance of apparent and real structure, or of imitation of stone or marble in paint or plaster.

The agony of the Laocœus, the action of the Discobolus, the upspringing of the Mercury, are all apparently real in their action by the innate truth of their conformation. . . . Truth is therefore the highest quality in Art.

Fairholt, Dict. Terms of Art.

In truth and skill of modelling even the sculptures of Chartres and St. Denis, which are a century earlier in date, surpass those of Wells.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 286.

(d) Habitual disposition to speak only what is true; veracity; purity from falsehood; truthfulness; sincerity; uprightness; honesty: as, a man of truth.

For as long as we be bounden to gedere in places—that is to seyne, in Love, in Truth, and in gode Accord—no man schalle ben of powere to greve you.

Manderley, Travels, p. 229.

Love is all truth.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 804.

(e) Disposition to be faithful; fidelity; constancy.

Long since we were resolved of your truth.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 4. 20.

Now I shall try thy truth—If thou dost love me,
Thou wilt not say any thing compared with me.

Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, ii. 1.

Alas! they had been friends in youth,
But whispering tongues can poison truth.

Coleridge, Christabel, ii.

(f) The state of not being counterfeited or adulterated; genuineness; purity.

The truth of thy love to me.

Shak., As you Like it, i. 2. 13.

2. That which is true. (a) Fact; reality; verity: as, a lover of truth, often personified.

"Sygrem," he said, "to yow I will not lye,
I shall yow telle the truth of this mater."

Genevieve (E. E. T. S.), i. 228.

Deame thee best in every doute

Tyl the truth be tryed oute.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 332.

You peradventure think aptness and ableness all one; whereas the truth is that, had we kept our first ableness, grace should not need. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v., App. 1.

For my mouth shall speak truth. Prov. viii. 7.

For truth is truth

To the end of reckoning. Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 45.

Oh, Truth, thou art a mighty conqueror!

Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 3.

Truth is the most unbending and uncomplicable, the most necessary, firm, immutable, and adamantine thing in the world.

Cudworth, Morality, IV. v. § 3.

Kant regards it as a duty owed to oneself to speak the truth, because "a lie is an abandonment or, as it were, annihilation of the dignity of man."

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 292.

(b) A verified fact; a true statement or proposition; an established principle, fixed law, or the like.

Fundamental truths. . . like the lights of heaven, are not only beautiful and entertaining in themselves, but give light and evidence to other things that without them could not be seen.

Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, § 43.

(c) That which is righteous or in accordance with the divine standard.

He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God.

John iii. 21.

3†. Faith pledged; pledge; troth. See truth.

I'll give thee the truth of my right hand;

The truth of it I'll freely gie.

Young, Belehan and Susie Pye (Child's Ballads, IV. 4).

Cartesian criterion of truth. See Cartesian.—Complex truth. See complex.—Contingent truth, a truth which is not absolute, but contingent on something else.

tryma (tri'mi), n.; pl. trymata (-ma-ti). [NL., < Gr. τρυμα, τρυπη, a hole, < τρυπώ, rub.] In bot., a drupe or drupeaceous nut with a fleshy exocarp which is at length dehiscent or otherwise, as in the walnut and hickory-nut. It may be accurately defined as a one-seeded fruit with a well-defined stony endocarp, and with the outer part of the pericarp fleshy, leathery, or fibrous; it is distinguished from the drupe by being derived from an inferior instead of a superior ovary.

Buff-breasted Sandpiper (Tryngites rufescens).

trynet, a. An old spelling of *trine*³.

Tryngites (trin-jit'ez), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1856), < Gr. τρυγίς, a bird so called by Aristotle, a sandpiper, + -ites. Cf. Tringa.] A genus of small tatters, of the family Scolopacidae; the marble-winged sandpipers. They resemble true sandpipers very closely, but are totarine, not tringine; the bill is short and extremely slender; the toes are cleft to the base, or with a mere trace of webbing; the tail is not barred, and the flight-feathers have a peculiar tracery, like the veining of marble, of black on a pearly-white ground. T. rufescens (or subruficollis) is the buff-breasted sandpiper of both Americas, very wide-ranging, and breeding in high latitudes; it is about 8 inches long and 16 in extent of wings. This bird is a near relative of Bartram's sandpiper among North American forms, and is still more closely related to certain Polynesian sandpipers. See cut in preceding column.

Trypanosoma (trip-a-nō-sō'mi), n. [< Gr. τρυπανον, a borer, + σωμα, body.] A genus of flagellate infusorians, typical of the family Trypanosomatidae. T. sanguinis, also called Undulina ranarum, occurs in the blood of amphibians.

Trypanosomata (trip-a-nō-sō'ma-ti), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of trypanosomatus; see trypanosomatus.] An order of infusorial animalcules, formed for the reception of the Trypanosomatidae (which see).

Trypanosomatidae (trip-a-nō-sō-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Trypanosomata + -idae.] The only family of Trypanosomata. These animals are free-swimming, of compressed form, with one side produced as a thin undulating frill, the anterior end sometimes with a flagellate appendage, but without distinct oral aperture.

trypanosomatous (trip-a-nō-som'a-ti), a. [< NL. trypanosomatus, < Gr. τρυπανον, a borer, auger (see trypan¹), + σωμα, body.] Of or pertaining to the Trypanosomata.

Trypanostoma (trip-a-nōs'tō-mi), n. [NL., < Gr. τρυπανον, a borer, + στομα, mouth.] A genus of univalves: same as Pleurocard.

Trypeta (tri-pē'ti), n. [NL. (Meigen, 1803), < Gr. τρυπητή, a borer, < τρυπή, bore; see trypan¹.] A notable genus of flies, typical of the family Trypetidae, of medium size, and yellowish-gray or greenish-yellow in color, with banded, spotted, or clear wings. It is a large and wide-spread genus, the species of which mainly breed in the flower-heads of composite plants, often making gall-like deformations.

Apple maggot (Trypeta pomonella) and Fly, enlarged four times.

The larva of T. pomonella is the common apple-maggot or railroad worm of the United States; it often does great damage to the apple-crop, particularly in the northeastern States. T. ludens in the larval state bores into oranges in Mexico. About 25 species occur in Europe, while more than 80 are known in North America. The genus has been divided into a large number of subgenera.

Trypethelium (trip-e-thē'l-i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. τρυπητή, bore, + θηλή, nipple.] A genus of verrucariceous lichens, having immersed apothecia and ellipsoidal (usually four-celled) spores. About 30 species are known, mostly of intertropical regions, there being but 3 in North America.

Trypetidae (tri-pet'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Loew, 1862), < Trypeta + -idae.] A family of acalyptate flies, typified by the genus Trypeta. They have the venation complete, the front on each side with two rows of bristles, the border of the mouth with no bristles, and only the middle tibiae spurred. The ovipositor is horny, consisting of three elongated retractile segments, the last of which ends in a simple point. See cut under Trypeta.

trypographic (trip-ō-graf'ik), a. [< Gr. τρυπη, bore, perforate, + γραφω, write.] Pertaining to or produced by trypographic printing: as, a trypographic stencil, circular, or letter. Trypographic printing, a method of printing by the use of paper stencils, in which the stencils are formed by placing the paper sheets on a flat steel surface, uniformly cut after the manner of a file, and writing upon them with a stylus. The paper is thus minutely perforated under the marks made by the stylus. The stencils are used in the same way as ordinary stencils for reproducing the written text.

try-pot (tri'pot), n. In whaling, the vessel in which blubber is tried out.

Trypoxylon (tri-pok'si-lon), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), < Gr. τρῖπων, bore, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of fossorial hymenopterous insects, of the family Crabronidae, composed of small solitary wasps having the eyes deeply emarginate within, the abdomen long and clavate, the marginal cell long, pointed at the apex, and the venation of the posterior wings complete. They are noted for adapting the old nests of other species to their own use. T. albiparvum is found abundantly in the old cells of wasps of the genus Pelopaeus in the United States. Three European and fourteen North American species are known.

trypsin (trip'sin), n. [Prob. for tripsine, so called because it was first obtained by rubbing down the pancreas with glycerin; < Gr. τρυπνέω, a rubbing (< τρυπνέω, rub), + -in.] The proteolytic ferment which is the active principle of the pancreatic fluid; pancreatin. It is active in neutral or alkaline solutions, and not only produces peptones from the proteid matter of the food, but further converts a portion of the peptones into leucin and tyrosin.

trypsinogen (trip-sin'ō-jen), n. [< trypsin + -gen.] A granular substance in the cells of the pancreas which is the antecedent of trypsin.

tryptic (trip'tik), a. [< trypsin (trypt-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to trypsin; as, tryptic action.

Tsuga (tsü'gü), n. [NL. (Carrière, 1855), < Jap. tsuga, the name of T. Araragi, lit. 'yew-leaved' or 'evergreen.']

1. A genus of coniferous trees, of the tribe Abietineae, including the hemlocks, and intermediate between Picea, the spruce, and Abies, the fir. Its staminate flowers and its seemingly two-ranked flat linear leaves resemble those of Abies, but it agrees with Picea instead in its persistent petiole-bases and in its reflexed cones with persistent scales. The 6 species are evergreens with slender flat or often pendulous branchlets, and narrowly linear leaves, flat above (convex or keeled in T. Pattoniana), and spirally inserted, but spreading in two ranks. The main branches are mostly horizontal, and are irregularly inserted, not whorled as in the fir and spruce. They are tall trees (excepting T. Caroliniana), reaching 50 to 100 feet high, with large cylindrical trunks and thick brown bark, which is deep-red within. The cones are small and brown, an inch or less long, or in T. Pattoniana cylindrical and 2 or 3 inches long; in this and in T. Mertensiana they are bright-purple until ripe. Two species are found on the Atlantic and 2 on the Pacific side of North America, and 2 in Asia. In each case one of the two species is inferior, alpine, and more or less local, while the other is more wide-spread, and approaches the coast. T. Canadensis, the hemlock-spruce, is most highly developed in the Alleghany range, extending south to Alabama, and forming the larger part of the dense forests northward. Its trunk is often 3, sometimes 6, feet in diameter, forming in the oldest trees a nearly uniform shaft for two thirds of its length. It furnishes the principal timber of the eastern United States, and a coarse wood, the red and the white hemlock of lumbermen. It is the source of hemlock-pitch, used in stimulating plasters, and of a fluid extract sometimes used as an astringent. It is now planted for hedges and to ornament lawns in the eastern States, also in Europe and Australia and is much admired in its earlier growth for its delicate spray with light-green leaves silvery beneath, and hung with small oval brown cones about the ends of the branches. (See cut under imbricate.) In middle life the long-persistent dead lower branches often render it unsightly, and impair the value of the wood. T. Caroliniana is the Carolina hemlock, a small and rare tree of dry rocky ridges in the Carolinas, having larger, glossier, blunter leaves, and larger cones with wide-spreading scales. T. Mertensiana, the western hemlock, forms large forests in Oregon, extending to Montana and Alaska; it yields the principal tanning-material of the northwestern States and a coarse inferior lumber; it exceeds the eastern species in its size, being sometimes 150 feet high and 12 feet in diameter. T. Pattoniana, the alpine spruce, occurring locally from British Columbia to California, sometimes 7 feet in diameter, peculiar in the deflexed base of its spreading branches and its finer satiny wood, is exceptional in the genus in its scattered quadrangular leaves, with the persistent petiole-base hardly prominent, two-lobed pollen-grains like those of pines, and large leather-brown cones with their scales reflexed. It is therefore separated by Lemmon (1800) as a genus, Hesperopiceae. T. Araragi (T. Sieboldii) of Japan, the original species, forms large forests on Fusi-yama and other mountains, is planted about temples, and yields a fine-grained yellowish timber, much used by the Japanese and Chinese for turning and for furniture. Its variety nana, a dwarf species 2 or 3 feet high, known as fine tsuga, is there a favorite garden shrub. T. dumosa (T. Brauniana), the tang-sing of blutan—a tall tree with graceful drooping branchlets, used for incense by the Hindus—is one of the handsomest forest-trees of the Himalayas, often growing to from 6 to 8 feet in diameter.

2. [t. c.] A tree of this genus.

tsun (tsun), n. [Chinese.] An inch, being the tenth part of a Chinese chih or foot.

tsung-tuh (tsung'tu'), n. sing. and pl. [Chinese, < tsung, general, + tuh, overseer.] The highest provincial officer in China; a viceroy or governor-general, having the general control of all civil and military affairs of one or more provinces, and subject only to the throne. The eighteen provinces of China proper are governed by eight tsung-tuh or viceroys, and sixteen futai or governors.

tuart, n. See tuart.

tuatera (tō-a-tā'ri), n. The gigantic lizard of New Zealand, Hatteria (or Sphenodon) punctata. See cut under Hatteria.

tuath (tū'ath), n. [< Ir. tuath, people; see Dutch.] An Irish territorial division, or an association of persons. See the quotation.

The term Tuath was at the same time genealogical and geographical, having been applied to the people occupying a district which had a complete political and legal administration, a chief or Rí, and could bring into the field a battalion of seven hundred men. The word was also applied, however, to a larger division, consisting of three or four, or even more, Tuaths, called a Mór Tuath, or great Tuath, which were associated together for certain legal and legislative purposes, and the troops of which were united together in war under one commander.

W. K. Sullivan, Introduct. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. lxxix.

tub (tub), n. [< ME. tubbe, < MD. D. tobbe = MLG. tubbe, tubbe, LG. tubbe, a tub; origin unknown. Some suppose, against phonetic probability, a connection with LG. töwer = OHG. zubar, MHG. zuber, zober, G. zuber, zober, a vessel, a contracted form of OHG. zweibar, zuiyar, a vessel with two handles (cf. OHG. cinbar, MHG. cinber, cinber, G. cimer, a vessel with one handle); < LG. to, OHG. zwei, zwei, two, + -bar, connected with E. hear (see amber).] 1. An open wooden vessel made of staves, held together by hoops, surrounding a bottom; as, a wash-tub; a butter-tub; the tub in which the tow-line is coiled in a whale-boat.—2. The contents of a tub; as much as a tub will hold; as a measure of capacity, sometimes erroneously confounded with firkin. A tub of butter, by a statute of George III., was 84 pounds or 11 firkins, but locally still larger. As a measure of corn, by a statute of George II., the tub was 4 bushels. A tub of tea is 60 pounds. 3. Any wooden structure shaped like or resembling a tub. (a) A pulpit; used contemptuously. Compare tub-preacher, tub-thumper. [Slang, Eng.]

High on a gorgeous seat, that far out-shone
Heuley's gilt tub, or Flecknoe's Irish throne.
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 2.

"The Rev. Moses Barraclough: 't'ub orator you call him sometimes, I think." "Ah!" said the Rector. . . . "He's a tailor by trade."
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, viii.

(b) A clumsy, slow boat or vessel; so called in contempt. There is no uglier vessel than a real old north-country Geordie or coalman, with the run of a sugar-box. . . . The name of this deep and wallowing tub was the Richard and Ann.
W. C. Russell, A Sea Queen, xvi.

(c) A boat used for practice-rowing.

The freshmen are put into harness in tub-pairs or four-oars.
Dickens's Dick, Oxford, p. 17.

Practice in gigs, or more technically styled tubs (small boats to hold a pair of oarsmen, and in the stern of which the coach steers and advises the rowers).
Daily Telegraph, Feb. 9, 1887. (Encyc. Diet.)

4. A small cask for holding liquor, especially in the eighteenth century, and before the change in English revenue laws; such a cask in which brandy, gin, or the like was smuggled from the Continent.

I made three seizures, besides sweeping up those thirty-seven tubs.
Murray, Three Cutters, ii.

5. A receptacle for water or other liquid for bathing the person. See bath-tub.

The retiring bower,
So furnish'd as might force the Persian's envy,
The silver bathing-tub, the cambric rubbers.
Massinger, Guardian, ii. 5.

6. Hence, the act or process of bathing in a tub; specifically, a sponge-bath taken while standing in a tub. [Colloq.]

From early morn till dewy eve, when she had it out of him in the cold tub before putting him to bed.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 2.

7. Sweating in a heated tub, formerly the common mode of treatment of lues venerea. Compare powdering-tub, 2.—8. In mining: (a) A bucket for raising ore from a mine. (b) A box, wagon, or tram for conveying coal from the working-face to the pit-bottom or gangway, or for underground haulage in general. The names given to the various vehicles or receptacles used for transporting coal, as well as their shape and size and the material of which they are made, vary considerably in different English collieries. See buggy. (c) Same as kerrie.

—9. The top of a malt-kiln. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—10. The garnet. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Cat under a tub (naut.), a supposed hindrance or obstacle; an accidental unavoidable delay. Thus, when a vessel is prevented from sailing by unavoidable circumstances, it is said that some one has a cat under a tub, it being a superstition that if a cat is put under a tub it will hinder the vessel from sailing. [New Eng.] Culling-tub, a receptacle into which mackerel are thrown to be sorted.—Grog-tub (naut.), a tub for holding the grog which used to form part of the crew's rations.—Powdering tub. See powdering-tub.—Quenching-tub. See quenching.—Tale of a tub, an idle or silly fiction; a cock-and-bull story.

Ye say they follow your law,
And vary not a shaw,
Which is a tale of a tub.
Bp. Bale, Comedy Concerning Three Laws. (Sares.)

You shall see in us that we preached no lies, nor tales of tubs, but even the true word of God. Coverdale.

To throw a tub to a whale, to create a diversion in order to avoid a danger.—Tub-campbor. See the quotation.

Japanese camphor is distinguished from Formosan by being coarser grained, clearer, of pinker hue, and by subliming at a lower temperature. It is also known as "Dutch" or "tub" camphor, the latter name arising from its being imported to Europe in tubs covered with matting, each placed within a second tub secured on the outside by hoops of twisted cane. Spens's Encyc. Manuf., p. 554.

tub (tub), v.; pret. and pp. tubbed, pp. tubbing. [< tub, n.] I. trans. 1. To plant or set in a tub; as, to tub plants.—2. To bathe in a tub or bath.

You shall be soaked, and stroked, and tubbed, and rubbed.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1.

3. In mining, to line (a shaft) with a casing of wood or iron. See tubbing.

II. intrans. 1. To bathe or wash the person in a bathing-tub; especially, in colloquial use, to take the morning bath. [Eng.]

We all tub in England.

2. To row in a tub; practise in a tub. See tub, n.

tuba (tū'bā), n.; pl. tubæ, tubas (-bē, -bās). [L., a trumpet; see tube.] 1. A musical instrument of the trumpet family, of very large size and low pitch. It is essentially similar to the bombardon, though not always made in the same shape. Its compass is nearly four octaves, including, by means of three or five valves, all the chromatic tones. The fundamental tone is usually the third F or E₃ below middle C. Lower varieties are often called bass or contra-bass tubas. The tuba is much used in military bands, and is more or less common in the orchestra, where it is used in conjunction with the trombones.

2. In organ-building, a reed-stop of large scale, so connected with a separate bellows with extra weights that the tones are of exceptional power and majesty. Usually called tuba mirabilis.—3. In anat. and zool., a tube or tubular part or organ; specifically, the Eustachian tube, or salpinx. See hydra tuba (under hydra), and cut under sciphistoma.—Bass tuba, a musical instrument, the largest of the trumpet family, and the deepest and most sonorous member of the brass wind division of the orchestra, having a large and long metal tube and five valves; its compass is about four octaves from the fourth A below middle C. It was invented in 1835.—Dilatator tubæ. See dilatator.

tubage (tū'bāj), n. [< tub + -age.] 1. In gunn., the act or process of lining a heavy gun by inserting a tube of wrought-iron, bronze, or steel.

The present short steel tube has been the result of the essays in the tubage of guns.

Report of Chief of Ordnance, 1882, p. 244.

2. In med., the insertion of a tube into one of the passages, usually the esophagus or larynx; intubation. Tubage of the glottis. Same as intubation of the larynx (which see, under intubation).

tubal (tū'bal), a. [< tub + -al.] In med., of or relating to one of the passages called tubes in the body, more commonly the Fallopian tube.—Tubal dropsy, dropsy of one or both Fallopian tubes.—Tubal nephritis, Bright's disease of the kidneys. Tubal pregnancy, the development of the embryo to some extent within the Fallopian tube instead of the uterus.

tubar (tū'bār), a. [< tub + -ar.] Same as tubal; as, tubar pregnancy.

tubarium (tū-bā'ri-um), n.; pl. tubaria (-ā). [L., < L. tubus, pipe, tube; see tube.] A tube or system of tubes secreted and inhabited by polypides or polypites; a tubular zoecium or zoethecium.

tubate (tū'bāt), a. [*< NL. tubatus, < L. tubus, tube; see tube.] Forming a tube; tubiform; tubar; tubular; also, provided with a tube or tubes; tubulate.

tubbeck (tub'bēk), n. [Burmese.] A sash of silk, or silk and cotton, usually red, worn by women in Burma.

tubber (tub'ēr), n. [< tub + -er.] 1. A cooper. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]-2. In mining, a sort of pickaxe. Also called becl.

tubber-man (tub'ēr-man), n. In mining, the man who uses a tubber. Also called beck-man.

tubbing (tub'ing), n. [Verbal n. of tub, v.] 1. The art of making tubs.—2. Material for tubs.

—3. In mining, a method of keeping out the water in sinking a shaft in very watery ground; also, the material employed for this. It consists in providing a water tight lining for the shaft, which is inserted piece by piece as the sinking progresses, thus reducing the extent of surface from which the water enters the shaft as quickly and as completely as is possible. Tubbing was formerly usually made of oak timber in France, where this method of sinking was first introduced; but iron has been employed in England, in the form both of segments of cylinders and of complete rings. Tubbing of masonry has also been used in England and Germany. 4. The act or process of bathing or of being bathed in a tub; a tub-bath.

In spite of all the tubbing, rubbing, scrubbing,
The ronting and the grubbing,
The Blacks, confound them! were as black as ever!
Hood, A Black Job.

5. The act of racing in tubs. See tub-racer.

A good deal of tubbing has been got through in the mornings.
The Field, March 5, 1887. (Encyc. Diet.)

tubbing-wedge (tub'ing-wej), n. A wedge of yellow pine, about 4 inches in length. Wedges of this kind are driven in between the joints of tubbing in order to make them water-tight.

tubbish (tub'ish), a. [< tub + -ish.] Like a tub; tubby; round and fat.

He was a short, round, large-faced, tubbish sort of man.
Dickens, Sketches, Characters, vii.

You look for men whose heads are rather tubbish,
Or drum-like, better formed for sound than sense.
Walcot (Peter Findar), Works, p. 156. (Davies.)

tubby (tub'ī), a. [< tub + -y.] 1. Tub-shaped; round like a tub or barrel.

We had seen him coming up to Covent Garden in his green chaise-cart with the fat, tubby little horse.
Dickens, Sketches, Scenes, vi.

2. Having a sound like that of an empty tub when struck; sounding dull and without resonance; applied to stringed musical instruments. tub-drummer (tub'drūb'ēr), n. A tub-thumper or tub-preacher. [Slang.]

Business and poetry agree as ill together as faith and reason: which two latter, as has been judiciously observed by the famed tub-drummer of Covent Garden, can never be brought to set their horses together.

Tom Brown, Works, III. 198. (Davies.)

tube (tūb), n. [< F. tube = Sp. tubo, It. tubo, < L. tubus, a pipe, tube; cf. tuba, a trumpet.] 1. A pipe or hollow cylinder, especially when of small size and used as a conduit for liquids, or for containing liquids, as in some forms of scientific apparatus. Mechanically there is no distinction between a pipe and a tube; but in use the two words are often somewhat arbitrarily distinguished. Thus, when the form of the thing is chiefly considered, tube is regularly used; as, a steam-boiler having the shape of a large tube—not pipe; so, also, with reference to certain mechanical uses one word or the other is exclusively used; as, a gas-pipe, a drain-pipe, a test-tube. The words are also distinguished in use, but less clearly, according to the material employed; as, an iron pipe, a rubber tube, a brass tube, etc.

He lifts the tube (a gun), and levels with his eye;
Straight a short thunder breaks the frozen sky.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 129

2. Specifically, the main body of a musical instrument of either the wood wind or the brass wind group. The bore of such instruments is usually conical, but sometimes cylindrical.—3. In anat. and zool., a hollow tubular organ; a pipe, canal, or duct conveying fluid or gas; especially, a pipe which seems to be empty—that is, conveys air; as, the bronchial tubes; the Eustachian tube. An artery or a vein is a tube, but nearly if not all the structures which convey special fluids receive distinctive names. See tuba, tubule. 4. In bot., any hollow elongated body or part of an organ; applied especially to a gamopetalous corolla or gamosepalous calyx, also to a united circle of stamens (see cut 9 under stamen).—5. A priming tube.—6. A telescope, or that part of it into which the lenses are fitted.

A spot like which, perhaps,
Astronomer in the sun's lucid orb
Through his glazed optic tube yet never saw, Milton, P. L., iii. 590.

Philosophic tube,
That brings the planets home into the eye of observation. Conquer, Task, iii. 229.

7. The barrel of a chain-pump.—8. A small receptacle of drawn lead, of approximately tubular form, closed at the bottom by bending it over twice or three times on itself, and having a screw-cap at the top, used to hold pigments or similar matter in a semiliquid condition.—Auricular tube. See auricular.—Bellini's tubes, the excretory tubes of the kidneys, opening on the papilla.—Bowman's corneal tubes. See corneal.—Bronchial tubes. See bronchial.—Capillary, cardiac, cerebromedullary, conaral tube. See the adjectives.—Circulating tubes, tubes placed in steam-generators to afford or establish a circulation of the water.—Conversation-tube. See conversation.

Crookes tubes. See crookes.—Dental, detonating, diffusion tube. See the qualifying words.—Eso-phageal tube. Same as stomach-tube.—Eustachian, Fallopian, gelatinous, hepatic tube. See the qualifying words.—Feeding-tube, an elastic tube passed into the stomach, through which food is introduced.—Geissler's tube, an apparatus in which light is produced by an electric discharge through rarefied gases. It is used with the induction-coil, and consists of a sealed tube with platinum connections at each end, through which the electric spark is transmitted. The color and intensity of the light depend upon the nature of the gas with which the tube is charged.

Impregnating-tube. See impregnate.—Intubation tube, a short hollow cylinder of peculiar shape, having a flange at its upper extremity, which is inserted between the vocal cords in cases of laryngeal obstruction, especially in croup.—Laryngeal tube, a short hollow cylinder of special form, used in intubation of the larynx.—Laticiferous tubes. See laticiferous.—Leifer's tube or coil, a long flexible tube made into a coil surrounding the body or a limb, through which hot or cold water is allowed to flow in order to raise or lower the temperature of the part.—Lightning-tube. Same as fulgurite.—Lobular bronchial tube, Malpighian tubes, medullary tube. See lobular, Malpighian, medullary.

Milk-testing tubes, a form of lactometer containing a number of tubes graduated alike, in which different samples of milk can be put for comparison under identical conditions.—Muscular, nasal, pericardial tube. See the adjectives.—Pitot's tube, in hydraulics, an instrument for ascertaining the velocity of water in rivers, etc.; a current-meter. It consists in its simplest form of a bent glass tube A, which is held in the water in such a manner that its lower end is horizontal, and opposed to the direction of the flowing water. In consequence of the momentum of the moving fluid, the level rises within the tube to a height B, proportional to the velocity of the stream.—Pneumatic despatch tube. See pneumatic.—Pneumatic tube, a tube through which packets of merchandise, or messages, as telegraphic despatches or items of news enclosed in suitable boxes, are rapidly transmitted from one point to another by means of air-pressure. The difference of pressure necessary to effect the desired movement may be produced by forcing air in behind the carrier-box, after placing the latter in the tube, or by exhausting air from the space in front; or both these methods may be employed. Postal tube, pyloric tube, receiving tubes of the kidney. See the qualifying word.—Rectal tube, an elastic rubber tube introduced into the rectum to give exit to the intestinal gases, or to facilitate the giving of enemas.—Resistance-tube, in elect., a tube containing powdered carbon, water, or other conducting material used for introducing resistance into an electric circuit. The resistance is usually made adjustable either by changing the distance between the terminal plates in the case of a fluid, or by compressing the conducting material in the case of a powder.—Respiratory bronchial tube. Same as lobular bronchial tube.—Respiratory tube. See respiratory.—Salivary tubes of Pfeuffer. See salivary.—Test tube. See test-tube.—Toricellian tube. See Toricellian.—Tracheal tube, the trachea or windpipe. See trachea.—Tracheotomy-tube. See tracheotomy.—Tube of force, in elect. and magnetism, a space bounded by a number of lines of force. The total electric force is constant across any section of a tube of force.—Tube of safety. Same as safety-tube.—Tubes of Ferrein. Same as tubuli of Ferrein.—Uterine tubes, the Fallopian tubes. See Fallopian and uterus.—Visceral, vocal tube. See the adjectives. (See also air-tube, blowing-tube, breathing-tube, drainage-tube, stomach-tube, test-tube, vacuum-tube.)

tube (tûb), v. t.; pret. and pp. tubed, ppr. tubing. [< tube, n.] 1. To furnish with a tube or tubes.—2. To receive or inclose in a tube.

A recent improvement in the spinner tubes the yarn, rendering it smoother and more even than any process yet devised, leaving little to be desired in the manufacture of rope. Lucy, Seamanship, p. 598.

tube-bearing (tûb'bâr'ing), a. In entom., tubuliferous; specifically noting the Tubulifera.

tube-board (tûb'bôrd), n. See the quotation.

The channels, the resonators above the reeds, are not varied in size or shape (in the American reed-organ) as in the harmonium; they exactly correspond with the reeds, and are collectively known as the tube-board. Encyc. Brit., XI. 433.

tube-breather (tûb'brê'thēr), n. Any animal which breathes through tubes, trachea, or spiracles; a tracheate, as an insect; distinguished from gill-breather.

tube-brush (tûb'brush), n. A cylindrical or spiral wire brush used to clean the flues of a steam-boiler.

tube-casts (tûb'kâsts), n. pl. Minute cylinders found in the urine in certain forms of Bright's disease. They are formed in the tubules of the kidneys. See renal cast, under cast.

tube-clamp (tûb'klamp), n. 1. A clamp for engaging by compression and frictional contact the outer surface of a tube or pipe. Also tube-clip.—2. In well-boring, a tool for lifting well-tubing and drawing it up. It consists of two jaws which can be clamped securely on the tube, each jaw having a bail in which the tackle-hook engages. E. H. Knight.

tube-cleaner (tûb'klê'nēr), n. An instrument for scraping or brushing out the interiors of tubes, as a steel brush, a combination of steel springs arranged spirally about an axis, etc.

tube-clip (tûb'klip), n. 1. A form of tongs used by chemists, etc., for holding heated tubes or similar objects. E. H. Knight.—2. Same as tube-clamp.

tube-cock (tûb'kok), n. A cock consisting of a nozzle within which is inserted an india-rubber tube with a screw-valve to compress it when the opening is to be closed.

tube-colors (tûb'kul'grz), n. pl. See color.

tube-compass (tûb'kûm'pas), n. A draftsman's compass, having tubular legs containing sliding extension-pieces adjustable to any required length by means of set-screws.

tube-coral (tûb'kor'al), n. Tubipore.

tube-cutter (tûb'kut'tēr), n. A tool for cutting metallic tubes. The usual forms have a jaw to grasp the pipe, and an adjustable rotary cutter. E. H. Knight.

tube-door (tûb'dôr), n. In a steam-engine, a door in the outer plate of a smoke-chamber, affording access to the tubes for examination and cleaning. E. H. Knight.

tube-drawing (tûb'drâ'ing), n. The forming of tubes by drawing them down from thick cylinders.

tube-ferrule (tûb'fer'il), n. In a steam-boiler, a short slightly tapered metal sleeve driven over the end of a tube between the tube and the tube-sheet which supports the end, for the purpose of securing the parts firmly together by wedging. E. H. Knight.

tube-filter (tûb'fil'tēr), n. A chamber with porous or perforated walls, placed at the bottom of a driven well-tube or a pump suction-tube, to exclude gravel and other foreign matter.

tube-flower (tûb'flou'ēr), n. An ornamental shrub, Clerodendron Siphonanthus, native in the East Indies, widely cultivated in the tropics. It is an erect plant with few straight branches, and bears panicle white flowers with a very long curving corolla-tube (whence the name).

tube-flue (tûb'flû), n. In a furnace, a tube through which flame passes. E. H. Knight.

tube-foot (tûb'fût), n.; pl. tube-feet (-fê't). One of the numerous tubular locomotory pedicels of the ambulacra of echinoderms, as star-fishes and sea-urelins; a water-foot.

tube-form (tûb'fôrm), a. Same as tubiform.

tube-germination (tûb'jër-mi-nâ'shon), n. In bot., the germination of a spore which first produces a germ-tube.

tube-hearted (tûb'hâr'ted), a. Having a simple tubular heart; specifying the Leptocardia.

tube-machine (tûb'mâ-shên'), n. A machine for making tubes or pipes; a tube-drawing machine.

tube-nosed (tûb'nôzd), a. Having tubular nostrils, as a petrel; tubinarial. See Tubinaries.

tube-plate (tûb'plât), n. In steam-boilers, same as flue-plate.

tube-plug (tûb'plûg), n. In locomotive engines, a plug for driving into the end of tubes when burst by the steam.

tube-pouch (tûb'pouch), n. A pouch for holding priming-tubes.

tuber (tû'bēr), n. [< L. tuber, a bump, swelling, tumor, knob on plants, truffle, etc.; perhaps < tu in tumere, swell. Hence ult. prob. truffle.] 1. In bot., a subterranean body, usually of an oblong or rounded form, consisting morphologically of a stolon-like branch of a rhizome, much thickened, commonly at the end, and beset with "eyes," which are properly modified axillary buds. Some of these buds normally sprout the second season, giving rise to a new plant, for the nourishment of which the tuber is richly stored with starch. Typical examples are the common potato and the Jerusalem artichoke (see Helianthus, with cut); less familiar are the tubers of the dwarf dandelion (Krigia Dandelion), the American ground-nut (Apios tuberosa), and the ground-nut of Great Britain, Conopodium denudatum (Bunium flexuosum). Molliform tubers occur, as in Equisetum fluviatile (see moniliform) and Hydrocotyle Americana (see Hydrocotyle). Strictly, the tuber is to be distinguished from the tubercle (see tubercle (d) (3)) and the tuberous root (see tuberous); but the term often embraces these, especially the former.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of subterranean discomycetous fungi, the truffles, having the peridium warty or tubercled, without definite base, the asci ovoid or globose, and one- to three- or (rarely) four-spored. About 50 species are known. T. aestivum is the common truffle. See truffle (with cut).—3. In pathol., anat., and zool., some rounded swelling part; a tuberosity; a tubercle; a knot or swelling which is not the result of disease; used chiefly as a Latin word (with Latin plural tuberosa).—Olfactory tuber. Same as caruncula mamillaris (which see, under caruncula).—Tuber annulare, the annular tuber of the brain; the pons Varoli.—Tuber calcaris, the tuberosity of the calcaneum; the backward projection of the bone of the heel.—Tuber cinereum, a conical projection from the lower part of the cerebrum, just behind the optic chiasma and in front of the corpora albicantia.—Tuber cochleæ, the promontory of the tympanum. See promontory, 2 (b).—Tuber ischii. See ischii.—Tuber radii, the tuberosity of the radius, for the attachment of the biceps.

Tuberaceæ (tû-be-râ'sê-ê), n. pl. [NL., < L. tuber, a tuber, + -acæ.] An order of hypogeous or subepigynous discomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Tuber, having the gleba traversed by veins, and one- to eight-spored asci.

tubercled (tû'bê-râ-ted), a. [< L. tuberculatus, covered with knots or bosses (< L. tuber, a knob, boss; see tuber), + -ed2.] In her., having a rounded projection, or more than one. A serpent tubercled is tied in a knot or a close coil near the middle of the body.

tubercle (tû'bêr-kl), n. [< OF. tubercle, F. tubercle = Sp. tubérculo = Port. It. tuberculo, < L. tuberculum, a small swelling, a pimple, tubercle, dim. of tuber, a swelling; see tuber.] A little tuber, or tuberosity; a small tuberosity; especially, a small projection of a bone, for the attachment of a ligament or tendon, as of the femur, hyoid, scaphoid, ulna, tibia, zygoma, etc. See tuberculum and tuberosity. (a) A small rough elevation of the surface; a wart or pimple; a hard papilla; a little swelling; as, tubercles about the base of the bill of a bird, or on a toad's back. (b) In Echinaria, one of the numerous small rounded elevations of the body-wall to which the spines are articulated. See Echinaria, and cuts under Echinaria, Echinoides, and scutella. (c) In pathol.: (1) A hard, circumscribed, rounded elevation or nodule on the surface of the body or an organ. (2) A nodular mass of varying size, composed of granulation-cells, which often undergo caseation: the characteristic lesion of tuberculosis. (3) The affection called tuberculosis. (d) In bot.: (1) Any wart-like or knob-like excrescence. (2) A very small tuber. (3) A root-growth resembling a tuberous root (see tuberosus), except that it bears adventitious buds, especially near the top, thus approaching a tuber, whose buds, however, are normal: the sweet potato is an example; also, a tumefied kind of root produced by species of Oreochloa and related genera, definite in number and shape, apparently developed from the base of buds on the lower extremity of the stem, as in Oreochloa maculata and Oreochloa apifera (see cuts under palmaria and Oreochloa). Compare tubercle. (e) In entom., same as supplementary eye (which see, under supplementary).—Acoustic, amygdaloid, carotid tubercle. See the adjectives.—Anatomical tubercle, in pathol., a wart-like growth often seen on the hands of those who constantly dissect or make post-mortem examinations.—Conoid tubercle, a roughness of the clavicle for the attachment of the conoid ligament.—Cuneate tubercle, the slight eminence of the cuneate funiculus on a level with the adjoining clava.—Cuneiform tubercles. See cuneiform.—Darwin's tubercle, a nodule on the edge of the helix of the human ear, believed to be the vestige of the point of a pointed ear, such as is attributed to the fauns and satyrs of classic mythology, and as man may have had in an early stage of evolution of the human species.—Deltoid tubercle. (a) A roughness on the clavicle for the attachment of the deltoid ligament. (b) A roughness on the humerus for the insertion of the deltoid muscle: usually called deltoid ridge.—Genial tubercles. See genial.—Genital tubercle, the first appearance of the external organs of generation in the fetus.—Lacrimal tubercle, a small projection of the superior maxillary bone, at the beginning of the lacrimal duct: a guide to the surgeon in operations upon the duct.—Laminated tubercle. Same as nodule (a).—Madrepore tubercles. See madrepore.—Mammillary tubercle. See mammillary.—Mental tubercles. Same as genial tubercles.—Miliary tubercle. Same as gritum.—Ocular tubercle. Same as eye-eminence.—Olfactory tubercle. Same as caruncula mamillaris (which see, under caruncula).—Optic tubercles. See optic.—Pearly tubercle. Same as gritum.—Pharyngeal, plantar, scalene tubercle. See the adjectives.—Posterior tubercle of the thalamus. Same as pulvinar.—2.—Supra-anal tubercle. See supra-anal.—Tubercle bacillus, the bacillus characteristic of tuberculosis. See cut under tuberculosis.—Tubercle of a rib, the shoulder of a rib, which articulates with the transverse process of the corresponding vertebra; a tuberculum.—Tubercle of Lower, a prominence, not constant, between the orifices of the superior and inferior vena cava in the right atricle.—Tubercle of Rolando. Same as tuberculum cinereum Rolandi (which see, under tuberculum).—Tubercle of the epiglottis. See cushion of the epiglottis.—Tubercle of the ulna, the rough area at the base of the coronoid process, for the attachment of the brachialis anticus muscle.

tubercled (tū-bēr-kld), a. [< tubercle + -ed]. In bot., zool., and pathol., tuberculate; provided with or affected by tubercles.

tubercula, n. Plural of tuberculum.

tubercular (tū-bēr-kū-lār), a. [= F. tuberculaire = Sp. tubercular, *< NL. tubercularis, < L. tuberculum, tuberele: see tubercle]. 1. Formed like a tubercle; forming a tubercle; shaped into a little tuber or tuberosity; as, tubercular elevations. 2. Having tubercles; tuberculate. 3. In pathol., characterized by the presence of tubercles; of or pertaining to tuberculosis; tuberculous. —Tubercular consumption, tuberculosis of the lungs. —Tubercular diathesis, a constitutional predisposition to tuberculosis. —Tubercular laryngitis, tuberculosis of the larynx; laryngeal phthisis. —Tubercular leprosy, a form of leprosy characterized by the presence of nodule or of nodules of varying size on the surface of the body, especially the face; leontiasis; elephantiasis Græcorum. —Tubercular meningitis, an inflammation of the meninges of the brain, usually in children, due to the action of the tuberculous poison; acute hydrocephalus. —Tubercular peritonitis. See peritonitis. —Tubercular phthisis, tuberculosis, especially tuberculosis of the lungs. —Tubercular process, an elevation on the transverse process of a vertebra supporting the facet that articulates with the tubercle of the corresponding rib. —Tubercular sputum, the sputum of one suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis, usually containing large numbers of the tubercle bacilli. It is a common means of spreading the contagion of tuberculosis.

Tubercularia (tū-bēr-kū-lā'ri-ū), n. [NL. (Tode), < L. tuberculum, tuberele: see tubercle]. A genus of hyphomycetous fungi, having the conidia in filiform, usually branched sporophores, which are ovoid or oblong, hyaline, and typically solitary. The species, of which more than 60 are known, are not well characterized. T. vulgaris, one of the commonest forms, occurs on trees or shrubs, as of the genera Corylus, Prunus, Rubus, etc.

Tuberculariæ (tū-bēr-kū-lā-rī'ē), n. pl. [NL. (Ehrenberg, 1818), < Tubercularia + -æ]. A family of hyphomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Tubercularia.

tubercularize (tū-bēr-kū-lā-rī-z), v. t.; pret. and pp. tubercularized, pp. tubercularizing. [< tubercular + -ize]. To infect with tuberculosis.

Spittoons should always be emptied into the fire, and cleansed with boiling water. They should never be emptied on dung heaps, on garden soil (where they may tubercularize soil) . . .

tubercularly (tū-bēr-kū-lār-lī), adv. With regard to a tubercle or tubercles; so as to exhibit tubercles. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVI, 260.

tuberculate (tū-bēr-kū-lāt), a. [< NL. tuberculatus, < L. tuberculum, tuberele: see tubercle]. Same as tubercular.

tuberculated (tū-bēr-kū-lāt-ed), a. [< tuberculate + -ed]. Same as tuberculate.

tuberculation (tū-bēr-kū-lā'shon), n. [< tuberculate + -ion]. The formation of tubercles; the disposition or arrangement of a set of tubercles; a tubercular part, organ, or system.

tubercule (tū-bēr-kūl), n. [< F. tubercule, < L. tuberculum, tuberele: see tubercle]. 1. A tubercle or tuberculum. 2. In bot., any root of a class embracing both tuberous roots and tubercles; used specifically by Lindley. — Cineritious tubercule. (a) The tuber cinereum. (b) The tuberculum cinereum of Rolando.

tuberculi, n. Plural of tuberculus.

tuberculiform (tū-bēr-kū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. tuberculum, tuberele, + forma, form]. Like a tubercle in form; tubercular.

tuberculin (tū-bēr-kū-līn), n. [< tuberculum + -in]. 1. A liquid prepared by Koch (first in 1890) from cultures of tubercle bacilli, administered by hypodermic injection in tuberculosis as a therapeutic or diagnostic measure. Also called Koch's lymph, Koch's specific, and puratubol. 2. A ptomaine formed by the action of the tubercle bacillus.

tuberculization (tū-bēr-kū-lī-zā'shon), n. [= F. tuberculisation; as tubercule + -ize + -ation]. In pathol., the formation of tubercles, or the condition of becoming tubercled.

tuberculize (tū-bēr-kū-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. tuberculized, pp. tuberculizing. [< tubercule + -ize]. Same as tubercularize. Medical News, LIII, 187.

tuberculoid (tū-bēr-kū-lōid), a. [< tubercule + -oid]. In zool., having the appearance or shape of a tubercle; tuberculiform.

tuberculose (tū-bēr-kū-lōs), a. [< NL. tuberculosus: see tuberculus]. Tuberculate.

tuberculosed (tū-bēr-kū-lōst), a. [< tuberculosus + -ed]. In pathol., affected with tuberculosis. Medical News, LIII, 216.

tuberculosis (tū-bēr-kū-lō'sis), n. [NL., < L. tuberculum, tuberele, + -osis]. A specific disease affecting most of the tissues of the body, characterized by the formation of tubercles and the presence in the diseased parts of the tubercle bacillus. — Acute miliary tuberculosis, an acute affection characterized by the deposit of large numbers of minute tubercles in various organs of the body, accompanied by high fever, rapid pulse, and marked prostration; galloping or quick consumption. The disease is almost always rapidly fatal. — Laryngeal tuberculosis. Same as tubercular laryngitis (which see, under tubercular). — Pulmonary tuberculosis, tuberculosis of the lungs, popularly called consumption.

tuberculous (tū-bēr-kū-lūs), a. [= F. tuberculeux = Sp. Pg. tuberculoso = It. tuberculoso, *< ML. tuberculosus, < L. tuberculum, a tubercle: see tubercle]. 1. Tubercular; tuberculate. 2. In pathol., affected by tubercles; exhibiting or containing tubercles. 3. Pertaining to or of the nature of tuberculosis.

Greek elephantiasis . . . is a tuberculous disease affecting especially the skin, the mouth, and the nasal fossæ, and the organs of voice and respiration.

J. M. Carmichael, Operative Surgery, p. 39.

Tuberculous arthritis, tuberculosis of a joint. — Tuberculous inflammation, inflammation caused by the presence of the tubercle bacillus.

tuberculum (tū-bēr-kū-lum), n.; pl. tubercula (-lā). [L.: see tubercle]. 1. A little tuber; a small tuberosity. 2. In pathol.: (a) A hard, circumscribed, rounded elevation of small size on the surface of the body or an organ. (b) A nodule, of varying size, composed chiefly of granulation-cells: the characteristic lesion of tuberculosis. — Tubercula quadrigena, the corpora quadrigena. — Tuberculum annulare, the pons Varolii. — Tuberculum cinereum Rolandi, an eminence between the cuneate funiculus and the posterolateral groove of the oblongata, formed by the approach of the caput cornu posterioris to the surface. — Tuberculum dolorosum, a small painful nodule; neuroma. — Tuberculum hypoglossi. Same as trigonum hypoglossi. — Tuberculum mallei. Same as short process of malleus (which see, under process). — Tuberculum of a rib, the protuberance or shoulder by which a rib abuts against a transverse process of a vertebra, as opposed to its head or capitulum. See cut under endoskeleton. — Tuberculum pubis, tuberculum pubicum. Same as pubic spur (which see, under pubis). — Tuberculum sellæ, the olivary eminence. See olivary.

tuberculus (tū-bēr-kū-lus), n.; pl. tuberculi (-lī). [NL.: see tuberculum, tuberele]. In entom., same as supplementary eye (which see, under supplementary).

tube-retort (tū-b'rē-tōrt'), n. A chemical retort consisting of a glass tube having one end closed, and sometimes made with an enlarged bulb. E. H. Knight.

tuberiferous (tū-b'rīf'ē-rus), a. [< L. tuber, a tuber, + ferre = E. bear]. Producing or bearing tubers; as, a tuberiferous root. See cut under monitiform.

tuberiform (tū-b'rī-fōrm), a. [< L. tuber, a tuber, + forma, form]. In bot., tuber-shaped.

tuberont (tū-b'r-on), n. [< OF. tuberon, < Sp. tuberon, a shark]. A shark.

There waited on our ship fishes as long as a man, which they call Tuberon.
T. Stevens, 1579 (Arber's Eng. Garner, I, 133). (Darwin.)

tuberos¹ (tū-b'r-ōs), a. [< L. tuberosus, tuberosus: see tuberosus]. Tuberos; having knobs or tubers.

tuberos² (tū-b'r-ōs or tū-b'rōz; see the etymology), n. [= F. tubéreuse = Sp. Pg. tuberosa = It. tuberosa = G. tuberosa, < NL. tuberosa, the specific name of Polygonum tuberosum; prop. fem. of L. tuberosus, tuberosus; see tuberosus]. The name has become popularly confused with rose, and is, though prop. pronounced tū-b'r-ōs, commonly pronounced tū-b'rōz, as if < tube + rose]. A garden and greenhouse bulb, Polygonum tuberosum, much cultivated for its creamy-white, exceedingly fragrant flowers. These have a funnel-shaped perianth with thick lobes, often doubled, and are racemed at the summit of a wand-like stem 2 or 3 feet high. An American variety called the pearl has a much lower stem with larger flowers, and is preferred for forcing. In northern latitudes the bulbs are imported—in Europe, from France and Italy, and in the northern United States, Florida and Georgia, or even in New Jersey. Where the season is short, the bulb is sprouted under cover before setting out. The tuberos affords a perfumer's oil.

— Wild tuberos. See Spiranthes.

tuberosity (tū-b'r-ōs'it-ē), n.; pl. tuberosities (-tiz). [< F. tubérosité = Sp. tuberosidad = Pg. tuberosidade = It. tuberosità, *< ML. tuberositas (-t-s), < L. tuberosus, tuberosus: see tuberosus].

1. The state of being tuberos. 2. A swelling or prominence; especially, in anat. and zool., a large rough projection or protuberance of bone; a bony tuber, generally serving for the attachment of a muscle; as, the tuberosity of the ischium, or tuber ischii; the greater and lesser tuberosities of the humerus. Small tuberosities of bone are generally called tubercles. See cuts under crus, femur, humerus, and innominatum.

Whether he . . . swell out in starched ruffs, buckram stuffings, and monstrous tuberosities.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, i. 5.

Gluteal tuberosity. Same as gluteal ridge (which see, under gluteal).

tuberos (tū-b'r-us), a. [< OF. tuberosus, F. tubéreux = Sp. Pg. It. tuberosa, < L. tuberosus, full of lumps or protuberances, < tuber, a knob, lump; see tuber]. 1. Covered with knobby or wart-like prominences; knobbed. 2. In bot., of the nature of or resembling a tuber; bearing tubers. — Tuberos angiotoma, a subcutaneous form of angiotoma, resembling at times lipoma. — Tuberos pea. Same as beathpea. See also Lathyrus and knapperts. — Tuberos root, a true root, commonly one of a fascicle, so thickened by the storage of nutriment as to resemble a tuber. It bears no buds itself, but nourishes those produced on the persistent base of the stem. The root of the dahlia is an example. See cut under root.

tuberously (tū-b'r-us-lī), adv. With tubers or with tuberosity. Bull. of Ill. State Laboratory, II, 28.

tuberosness (tū-b'r-us-nes), n. The state or character of being tuberos; tuberosity.

tuberos-rooted (tū-b'r-us-rōt'ed), a. An epithet properly of plants with tuberous roots, but more often applied to those bearing true tubers.

tube-scaler (tūb'skā-lēr), n. A tube-cleaner for cleansing the interior of steam-boiler tubes from soot and incrustations. E. H. Knight.

tube-scraper (tūb'skrā-pēr), n. A tube-cleaner; especially, one with springs or blades, as distinguished from one made of wire.

tube-sheet (tūb'shēt), n. Same as flue-plate. — Tube-sheet cutter, a tool for cutting holes to receive the tubes in the tube-sheets of boilers. E. H. Knight.

tube-shell (tūb'shēl), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Gastrochaenidae in a broad sense, or Bacillus tuberculosus, very highly magnified.

Tubicolidae, as the water-ring-pot shell and related forms. They agree in secreting a shelly tube about the long siphons, and in extreme cases this formation makes them look very unlike ordinary bivalves. The case is like that of the related teredos or ship-worms. Both valves may be of considerable size and separate from the tube; see cut under Gastropoda, or one may be free from the tube and the other fixed to it, as in Clavagella; or both may be very small and soldered to a large tube of singular construction, as in the true watering-pots. See cut under watering-pot.

tube-spinner (tūb'spin'ēr), n. A tube-weaver.
tube-stopper (tūb'stop'ēr), n. In steam-engine, a tube-plug.

tube-valve (tūb'valv), n. A valve consisting of a tube, which is held against its seat by a ball-weighted lever. E. H. Knight.

tube-vise (tūb'vīs), n. A vise especially adapted for seizing tubes or pipes; a pipe-vise.

tube-weaver (tūb'wē'vēr), n. Any spider of the group Tubicola or Tubitelx; a tube-spinner. Compare orb-weaver, tunnel-weaver, etc.

tube-well (tūb'wel), n. A device for obtaining water from beneath the ground, consisting of a wrought-iron pipe armed with a sharp point, and having a series of perforations at the lower end above the point. It is driven into the soft ground until water is reached. For many localities, where water is comparatively near the surface, a tube-well answers for all domestic purposes. In soils where the water is abundant near the surface, four or more tube-wells may be driven a few feet apart and united at the top by branch pipes, and may serve to supply a steam fire-engine, etc., by a direct connection, or to feed a steam-pump. It is commonly called, in the United States, a driven well, or drill-well.

tube-worm (tūb'wērm), n. A tubicolous worm; one of the sedentary annelids which live in cases; especially, a serpulid. See Tubicola, 2 (b).

tube-wrench (tūb'wēnch), n. A pipe-wrench.
tub-fake (tūb'fāk), n. A coil of tow-line in the line-tub of a whale-boat. J. W. Collins.

tubfasty (tūb'fäst), n. A process of treatment for the cure of venereal disease by sweating in a heated tub for a considerable time, during which strict abstinence had to be observed.

Bring down rose-checked youth
To the tub-fast and the diet.

Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 87.

tub-fish (tūb'fīsh), n. The sapphirine gurnard, Trigla hirundo. See gurnard. [Local, Eng.]

tubful (tūb'fūl), n. [< tub + ful.] A quantity sufficient to fill a tub; as much as a tub will hold.

tub-gig (tūb'gīg), n. A Welsh car. See the quotation.

The brothers [Carlyle] went in a steamer from Liverpool to Bangor, and thence to Llanberis, again in a tub-gig, or Welsh car. Frederic, Carlyle (Life in London, xi.).

tubi, n. Plural of tube.

tubicen (tūb'i-sen), n. [L., a trumpeter, < tuba, trumpet, + cene, sing. play.] A trumpeter.

tubicinate (tū-bis'i-nāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. tubicinated, ppr. tubicinating. [< L. tubicen (-cin-), a trumpeter (see tubicen), + -at.] To blow a trumpet. [Rare.]

Tubicolæ (tū-bik'ō-lē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of tubicola; see tubicola.] 1. A group of spiders which spin and inhabit a tubular web of silk, often strengthened outside with leaves or other materials; the tube-spinners. Compare Tubitelx. — 2. A group of annelids. (a) In Cuvier's classification, the first order of Annelides, consisting of such genera as Serpula, Sabellia, Terebellum, Amphitrite, and Dendrobia; thus a heterogeneous association of certain mollusks and worms. (b) Now, the sedentary or tubicolous annelids, or those worms which live in tubes. They comprise a part of the polychaetous annelids, and include several families, as Serpulidae, Sabelliidae, Terebellidae, Amphitritidae, and others. They are also called Sedentaria from their habits (as distinguished from Erataria), and Cephalopodaria, for the reason that the branchial organs are confined to the head or anterior part of the body. These are the processes which project so conspicuously from the tube. The tubes are of various substance and texture; they may be calcareous secretions of the animal, as in the serpulids, or composed of sandy and shelly or stony grit agglutinated together by a viscid secretion, as in the terebellids and others, or simply membranous. The tubes are straight or curved, sometimes spirally coiled, and usually form a complete case or covering into which the animal can withdraw for protection. Also Tubicolidae. See also cuts under Protula and Serpula.

tubicular (tū-bik'ō-lär), a. [< tubicola + -ar.] Same as tubicolous.

Spirorhis and other tubicular annelids occur as early as the Silurian period. Pasece, Zool. Class., p. 62.

tubicole (tū-bi-kōl), a. and n. [< NL. tubicola, living in a tube (i. e. in a tubular web), < L. tubus, tube, + colere, dwell, inhabit.] 1. a. Inhabiting a tube or a tubular web, as a spider; tubicular or tubicolous, as an annelid.

II. n. A tubicolous annelid.

Tubicolidae (tū-bi-kol'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tubicolæ + -idae.] 1. In conch., a family of bivalves: same as Gastropodidae. See tube-shell. — 2. Same as Tubicola, 2 (b).

tubicolous (tū-bik'ō-lus), a. [< tubicole + -ous.] In zool., inhabiting a tube; tubicole; tubicular; spinning a tubular web, as a spider; secreting a tubular case, as an annelid or a rotifer; having a tubular or fistulous shell, as a mollusk. See Tubicola, tube-shell, and cuts under Protula and Serpula. — Tubicolous rotifers, those wheel-animalcules, as distinguished from the free forms, which are enclosed in gelatinous cases which they secrete. The elongated body ends behind in an adhesive disk, by which the animalcules, singly or several together, are fixed. The foot or peduncle, by which they are attached, is a process of the neural side of the body, and thus differs from the foot of most free rotifers, which is a median process from the opposite side of the body, usually segmented and ending in a pair of movable styles.

tubicorn (tū-bi-kōrn), a. and n. [< L. tubus, tube, + cornu, horn.] 1. a. Hollow-horned, as a ruminant; caviern.

II. n. A tubicorn or caviern ruminant.

Tubicornia (tū-bi-kōrn'i-ä), n. pl. [NL.: see tubicorn.] The hollow-horned ruminants: same as Caviernia.

tubifacient (tū-bi-fä'shiēnt), a. [< L. tubus, tube, + facio (-t)-s, ppr. of facere, make.] Constructing a tube in which to dwell; tubicolous.

tubifer (tū-bi-fēr), n. [< L. tubus, tube, + ferre = E. bear.] That which bears a tube, as a tubicolous annelid.

tubiflorous (tū-bi-flō-rus), a. [< L. tubus, tube, + flos (-flor-), flower.] In bot., having tubular flowers or florets.

tubiform (tū-bi-fōrm), a. [= F. tubiforme, < L. tubus, tube, + forma, form.] Tubular; canalicular; having the form or character of a tube. Also tubiform.

tubilingual (tū-bi-ling'gwāl), a. [< L. tubus, tube, + lingua, tongue; see lingual.] Having a tubular tongue, as various honey-suckers and other birds.

Tubilingues (tū-bi-ling'gwēz), n. pl. [NL.: see tubilingual.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system, a synonym of Cinnymorphie: so named because the long extensible tongue constitutes a tubular snoutorial organ.

Tubinares (tū-bi-nā'rēz), n. pl. [NL. (Illiger, 1811), < L. tubus, tube, + nares, nostrils.] The tube-nosed or tubular water-birds, having the nostrils formed into a tube which lies upon the base of the culmen, as in the petrels, or into a pair of tubes, one on each side of the base of the bill, as in the albatrosses; the petrel family, or Procellariidae. Also called Nasutæ. See cuts under albatross, fulmar, huglen, and Cearelatu.

tubinarial (tū-bi-nā'ri-äl), a. [As Tubinares + -ial.] Having tubular nostrils, as a petrel; tube-nosed; or of pertaining to the Tubinares.

tubing (tū'bing), n. [Verbal n. of tube, v.] 1. The act of making tubes, or providing with tubes. — 2. A tube or tubes collectively; as, ten feet of tubing. — Rubber tubing, flexible tubing made of caoutchouc. Such tubing is made impervious to coal-gas by coating it with a solution of sodium silicate, or water-glass.

Tübingen school. See school.

tubiparous (tū-bip'a-rus), a. [< L. tubus, tube, + parere, produce.] Giving rise to tubes or tubules: as, a tubiparous gland. Micros. Sci., XXXI, 186.

Tubipora (tū-bip'ō-rä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1748), < L. tubus, tube, + porus, pore, passage.] The leading genus of Tubiporidae, or organ-pipe corals. T. musica is the best-known species. See cut in next column.

Tubiporaceæ (tū-bi-pō-rä'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubiporaceus; see tubiporaceus.] An order of aleyonarian polyps, containing the Tubiporidae or organ-pipe corals.

tubiporacean (tū-bi-pō-rä'sē-än), a. and n. [< tubiporaceus + -an.] Same as tubipore.

tubiporaceous (tū-bi-pō-rä'shi-us), a. [< L. tubus, tube, + porus, pore, passage, + -aceous.] Having the character of organ-pipe coral; belonging to the Tubiporaceæ.

Organ-pipe Coral (Tubipora musica).

tubipore (tū-bi-pōr), a. and n. [< L. tubus, tube, + porus, pore, passage.] 1. a. Having tubular corallites, each one of which opens by a pore; tubiporaceous; belonging to the Tubiporidae.

II. n. An organ-pipe coral.

Tubiporidae (tū-bi-pōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tubipora + -idae.] A family of aleyonarian polyps, typified by the genus Tubipora, which secrete a hard corallum in the form of tubular theca bound together by epitheca and without internal septa; the organ-pipe corals. The polyps have eight pinnately fringed tentacles, and are therefore octocoralline, not hexacoralline as most corals. They are completely retractile within their tubes, and are of a violet or grass-green color. The coral grows in large masses, usually red or purplish, and is found in the Indian and Pacific oceans. See cut under Tubipora.

tubiporite (tū-bi-pō-rīt), n. [< Tubipora + -ite.] A fossil organ-pipe coral, or some similar organism.

Tubiporites (tū-bi-pō-rī'tēz), n. [NL. (Schlottheim); see tubiporite.] A genus of tubiporites.

tubiporous (tū-bi-pō-rus), a. [As tubipore + -ous.] Same as tubipore.

Tubitelæ (tū-bi-tē'lē), n. pl. [NL., < L. tubus, tube, + tela, a web.] A group of rectigrade spiders, the tapestry-weavers, which have cylindrical spinnerets and spin tubular webs, as the genera Aglema, Tegenaria, and others; opposed to Inequitæ, Orbitæ, etc.

tubitelar (tū-bi-tē'lär), a. [< Tubitelæ + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the Tubitelæ.

Tubitelariæ (tū-bi-tē-lä'ri-ē), n. pl. [NL.: see Tubitelæ.] Same as Tubitelæ.

tubitelarian (tū-bi-tē-lä'ri-än), a. and n. [< Tubitelariæ + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Tubitelariæ; tubitelar.

II. n. A spider of the division Tubitelariæ.

tubivalve (tū-bi-valv), n. and a. [< L. tubus, tube, + valva, door; see valve.] 1. n. A bivalve mollusk with tubular siphonal sheath; a tube-shell.

II. a. Having a tubular or fistulous shell.

tubman (tūb'man), n.; pl. tubmen (-men). A barister in the Court of Exchequer in England who had a precedence in motions. See postman.

tubo-abdominal (tū'bō-ab-dom'i-näl), a. [< L. tubus, tube, + abdomen (-min-), abdomen, + -al.] Pertaining to a Fallopian tube and to the cavity of the abdomen. — Tubo-abdominal pregnancy, a form of extra-uterine pregnancy in which the ovum is arrested near the fibrillated extremity of the Fallopian tube, projecting thence in the course of its development into the abdominal cavity.

tub-oar (tūb'ōr), n. In whale-fishing, the oar which is pulled opposite the line-tub; also, the tub-oarsman.

tub-oarsman (tūb'ōrz'man), n. In whale-fishing, a man whose place in a whale-boat is near the tub containing the whale-line, and whose business is to see that no entanglement of the line takes place.

tubo-ovarian (tū'bō-ō-vä'ri-än), a. [< L. tubus, tube, + ovarium, ovary, + -an.] Pertaining to the ovary and to the Fallopian tube.

tubovarian (tū-bō-vä'ri-än), a. Same as tubo-ovarian.

tub-preacher (tūb'prē'chēr), n. [< tub, a kind of pulpit, + preacher.] A contemptuous term for a dissenting minister; hence, a ranting, ignorant preacher. Also tubster.

Here are your lawful ministers present, to whom of late you do not resort, I hear, but to tub-preachers in conventicles. Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, ii. 165. (Davies.)

tub-race (tūb'rās), n. A race in which the contestants paddle with the hands in tubs.

tu-brugge, n. [ME., < tu, a form of tow¹, + brugge, bridge; see tow¹ and bridge¹.] A draw-bridge. Hallivell.

Non stont the heved above the tu-brugge Faste bi Walcis.

Execution of Sir Simon Fraser (Child's Ballads, VI, 282).

tub-saw (tub'sā), n. A cylindrical saw which cuts staves from a block, and rounds them transversely: same as annular saw (a) (which see, under saw). E. H. Knight.

tub-size (tub'siz), v. t. See the quotation.

If paper is to be tub-sized as well as engine-sized, an animal size, made by soaking out the gelatine from clippings of horns, hides, etc., is mixed with dissolved alum and placed in a tub or vat, through which the web of paper is run after leaving the first set of driers.

Harper's Mag., LXXV, 124.

tubster† (tub'stér), n. [< tub + -ster†]. Same as tub-preacher.

He (says the tubster) that would be rich according to the practice of this wicked age must play the thief or the cheat.

Tom Brown, Works, III, 68. (Darics.)

tub-sugar (tub'shug'jir), n. Sugar packed in chests, and covered over with fine clay.

tub-thumper (tub'thum'pér), n. A violent or gesticulating preacher: one who employs violent action to give the effect or appearance of earnestness to his sermons. [Slang.]

tub-thumping (tub'thum ping), a. Ranting. [Slang.]

Very modest gifts, belonging to what may be called the tub-thumping school of oratory, have been known to fill a large church with eager congregations.

Contemporary Rev., LIV, 253.

tubular (tū'bū-lār), a. [= F. tubularis = Sp. Pg. tubular = It. tubulare, tubolare, *< NL. tubularis, < L. tubulus, a small pipe; see tubule.]

1. Having the form of a tube or pipe, without reference to size; tubuliform; tubiform; tubar; fistulous.—2. In bot., tube-like; tube-shaped; having a tube; tubulous: as, a tubular corolla or calyx.

Tubular filiform very fine colourless rootlets.

Le Maout and Decaisne, Botany (trans.), p. 917.

3. As applied to respiratory sounds, noting a sound like that produced by a current of air through a tube.—Horizontal tubular steam-boiler. See steam-boiler.—Rotary tubular steam-boiler. See rotary.—Tubular-arch bridge. See bridge.—Tubular bridge. See bridge.—Tubular ear, an ear of which the sills and floor-frames are made of iron gas-pipe.—Tubular crane, a crane with a hollow or tubular jib. Large tubular cranes sometimes have jibs made of boiler-plate rolled into tubular form and joined with rivets.—Tubular floating dock, a dock formed of capacious tubes, which may be sunk or floated, according as the tubular spaces are filled with water or with air.—Tubular girder, any hollow girder of metal, whatever the form in section. See girder.—Tubular glands, compound glands in which the divisions of the secreting cavity assume a tubular form.—Tubular lantern, a lantern having no guards except a rectangular frame of tubes through which the air-supply is carried. Car-Builer's Diet.—Tubular respiration. See respiration.—Tubular retort. Same as tube-retort.—Tubular steam-boiler. See steam-boiler.—Tubular surface, in geom. See surface.

Tubularia (tū'bū-lār'i-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1755), neut. pl. of tubularis*, tubular: see tubular.] An old genus of tubularian hydroids, now restricted as the type of a family Tubulariidae. T. inflata is an example.

Tubulariæ (tū'bū-lār'i-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see Tubularia.] The tubularian hydroids, or gymnoblastic hydromedusans; the Athecata or Gymnoblastea.

tubularian (tū'bū-lār'i-an), a. and n. [< Tubularia + -an.] 1. a. Hydriiform in tubular shape with a wide disk, a manubrium, and solid tentacles; of or pertaining to the Tubulariæ, or gymnoblastic hydrozoans.—Tubularian hydroids, the Gymnoblastea.

II. n. A member of the Tubulariæ. The tubularian polyps form an extensive series, by some authors divided into many families. Some of them resemble slender-stemmed composite flowers, as a dandelion, for example. In the usual forms the hydranth is flower-like and borne upon the end of a slender stalk (hydrocaul), several of which may unite below into a root-like form (hydrorhiza). The hydranth bears the gonophores upon stalks (blastostyles); these may be permanently attached (sporocysts), or may become detached and float off as free medusoids. Both hydranths and gonophores are naked (gymnoblastic or athecate).

tubularidan (tū'bū-lār'i-dan), a. and n. Same as tubularian.

Tubulariidae (tū'bū-lār'i-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tubularia + -idae.] A restricted family of tubularian hydromedusans, represented by the genus Tubularia, having the polyp-stock invested with a hard perisarc. Also Tubularida. See cut under Tubularia.

tubularity (tū'bū-lār'i-ti), n. [< tubular + -ity.] The quality of a tubular sound. See tubular, 3.

tubularly (tū'bū-lār-lī), adv. In the form of a tube.

Cells, either expanded or tubularly or vesiculary constricted.

H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Algae, p. 182.

tubulate (tū'bū-lāt), n. [= F. tubulé = It. tubulato, < L. tubulatus, formed like a pipe, < tubulus, a small pipe, a tube; see tubule.] Formed like a tube; tubulated.

tubulate (tū'bū-lāt), v. t.: pret. and pp. tubulated, ppr. tubulating. [< tubulate, a.] To form into a tube; also, to furnish with a tube. Elect. Rev. (Amer.), XV, xxv, 2.

A tubulated glass shade with a metal base.

Atkinson, tr. of Ganot's Physics, § 763.

Tubulated retort, a retort having a small tube, furnished with a stopper, so placed above the bulb that substances can be introduced into the retort without soiling the neck. A receiver with a similar tube and stopper is called a tubulated receiver.

tubulation (tū'bū-lā'shon), n. [< tubulate + -ion.] The formation of a tube or tubule; the disposition or arrangement of a set of tubes.

tubulature (tū'bū-lā-tjūr), n. [< tubulate + -ure.] The mouth or short neck at the upper part of a tubulated retort.

tubule (tū'būl), n. [= F. tubule = It. tubolo, < L. tubulus, a small pipe, a water-pipe, < tubus, a pipe, tube; see tube.] A small tube or pipe; as, the uriniferous or seminiferous tubules. See tubulus, and cut under Malpighian.

tubuli, n. Plural of tubulus.

tubulibranch (tū'bū-lī-brang), a. and n. [< L. tubulus, a tube, + branchia, gills.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Tubulibranchiata; tubulibranchian; tubulibranchiate.

II. n. A member of the Tubulibranchiata, tubulibranchian (tū'bū-lī-brang'ki-an), a. and n. [As Tubulibranchiata + -an.] Same as tubulibranch.

Tubulibranchiata† (tū'bū-lī-brang'ki-ā'tjī), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubulibranchiatus: see tubulibranchiate.] In Cuvier's classification, the seventh order of gastropods, having a more or less irregularly tubular shell, and consisting of 3 genera—Fermetus, Magilus, and Siliquaria: an artificial group. See cuts under the generic names.

tubulibranchiate (tū'bū-lī-brang'ki-āt), a. and n. [< NL. tubulibranchiatus, < L. tubulus, tube, + branchia, gills.] Same as tubulibranch.

Tubulicolæ (tū'bū-līk'ō-lē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of tubulicola*: see tubulicole.] In Cuvier's classification, an order of polyps, including the tubularians.

tubulicole (tū'bū-lī-kōl), a. and n. [*< NL. tubulicola, inhabiting a tube, < L. tubulus, a tube, + colere, dwell, inhabit. Cf. tubicole.] 1. a. Inhabiting a tubule, as a polyp; belonging to the Tubulicolæ.

II. n. A polyp of the group Tubulicolæ.

Tubulidentata (tū'bū-lī-den-tā'tjī), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubulidentatus*; see tubulidentate.]

One of the groups of the Entomophaga, or insectivorous Edentata, represented by the aardvark, or Cape ant-eater of South Africa, Oryzomys capensis. They furnish the only instance known among mammals of truly compound teeth, these organs being composed of bundles of parallel upright denticles, so that their substance is traversed by a number of parallel vertical canals. See also cut under aardvark.

tubulidentate (tū'bū-lī-den-tāt), a. [*< NL. tubulidentatus, < L. tubulus, a tube, + dentatus, toothed; see dentate.] Having compound teeth composed of tubular bundles of denticles; of or pertaining to the Tubulidentata.

Tubulifera (tū'bū-līf'er-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille, 1807), neut. pl. of tubulifer*: see tubu- liferous.] 1. In Latreille's system, the second tribe of hymenopterous insects, including the families Proctotrupi and Chrysididae, by MacLeay and Westwood restricted to the family Chrysididae; opposed to Securifera.—2. A stirps of the order Thysanoptera, including the genus Phlaothrips. Halliday, 1836.

tubuliferous (tū'bū-līf'er-us), a. [*< NL. tubulifer, < L. tubulus, tube, + ferre = F. bear.] In entom., having a tube-like ovipositor (see tubulus, 2); of or pertaining to the family Chrysididae or suborder Tubulifera.

Tubulifloræ (tū'bū-lī-flō'rē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1836), fem. pl. of tubuliflorus*: see tubuliflorous.] A suborder of composite plants, including 11 tribes, or all of the order except the Mutisiaceæ and Cichoriaceæ. It is characterized by flower-heads with all the perfect flowers tubular. Many genera possess ray-flowers, which are either pistillate or neutral. The types of tribes included are the genera Veronica, Eupatorium, Aster, Antennaria, Helianthus, Helianthus, Anthemis, Succisa, Calendula, Arcadia, and Cynara. The composite genera having all the flowers ligulate were formerly classed in the suborder Ligulifloræ.

tubuliflorous (tū'bū-lī-flō'r-us), a. [*< NL. tubuliflorus, < L. tubulus, tube, + flos (flor-), flower.] In bot., having the flowers of a head (in Compositæ) all with tubular corollas; of or pertaining to the Tubulifloræ.

tubuliform (tū'bū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. tubulus, tube, + forma, form.] Having the form of a small tube or tubule; tubular. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 381.

Tubulipora (tū'bū-līp'ō-rā), n. [NL. (Lamarck), < L. tubulus, a tube, + porus, pore.] The typical genus of Tubuliporida, containing such species as T. serpens.

tubulipore (tū'bū-lī-pōr), n. [< NL. Tubulipora.]

A polyzoan of the family Tubuliporida.

Tubuliporida† (tū'bū-lī-pōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Johnston, 1838), < Tubulipora + -ida.] A family of polyzoans, typified by the genus Tubulipora, and characterized by the tubular calcareous calyces.

tubuliporoid (tū'bū-lī-pōr'oid), a. [< tubulipore + -oid.] Resembling, characteristic of, or pertaining to the Tubuliporida.

Tubulosa (tū'bū-lō'sā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tubulosus*, tubulose: see tubulosa, tubulosus.] A group of Paleozoic corals of doubtful character, named by Edwards and Haime for such forms as Aulopora and Pyrgia. They have compound or simple corallum (in the former case the corallites united by branches and creeping corenchyma), tubular or pyriform these, rudimentary septa, and no tabulae.

tubulose (tū'bū-lōs), a. [*< NL. tubulosus: see tubulosus.] Tubular or tubuliform; fistulous. Specifically—(a) of or pertaining to the Tubulosa, (b) In entom., noting the lingua or tongue when it is very long, tubular, and capable of inflation, but without any terminal orifice, so that liquids cannot be sucked through it, as in the bees. (c) In bot., tubular.

tubulous (tū'bū-lūs), a. [< F. tubuleux = Pg. tubuloso = It. tubuloso, *< NL. tubulosus, tubular, < L. tubulus, tube; see tubule.] Tubulose; tubular. Sci. Amer., N. S., LXIV, 160.

tubulure (tū'bū-lūr), n. [< F. tubulure; as tubule + -ure.] In chem., a short open tube at the top of a retort, or in a receiver or bell-jar.

tubulus (tū'bū-lūs), n.; pl. tubuli (-lī). [NL., < L. tubulus, tube; see tubule.] 1. In anat. and zool., a tubule; chiefly in the plural: as, tubuli lactiferi, the milk-ducts; tubuli uriniferi, the urinary tubules.—2. In entom., a prolongation of the abdomen, consisting of several rings which can be retracted one into another like a pocket-telescope, serving as an ovipositor. It is found in the females of many flies and of the hymenopterous family Chrysididae. See Tubulifera, 1.—3. In bot., in Hymenogaster, a tube on the surface of the pileus which is lined with the hymenium; in Pyrenomyces, same as neck (see porc, 2, 3); in Diatomaceæ, same as corium, 2 (b).—Tubuli lactiferi. See def. 1, and galactophorous ducts, under duct.—Tubuli of Ferrein, the tubules composing the pyramid of Ferrein. Also called tubes of Ferrein.—Tubuli recti, short straight sections of the seminiferous tubules situated between the convoluted secreting tubules and the rete testis.

Tuburcinia (tū-bēr-sin'i-ā), n. [NL.—L. tuburcinari, eat greedily, devour.] A genus of molds. T. scabies is known by the name of potato-scab.

tubus (tū'būs), n.; pl. tubi (-bī). [NL.—L. tubus, a pipe, tube; see tube.] 1. In anat. and zool., a tube. [Little used.]—2. In entom., the mentum, or basal part of the labium, of a bee, forming with the bases of the maxillæ a tube leading to the epipharynx. Tubus Astronomicus, a constellation; same as Telescopium. Tubus vertebralis, tubus medullaris, the spinal canal; the hollow of the spinal column, containing the spinal cord.

Tubularian Polyp (Tubularia inflata).
1, group of polypites, half natural size; 2, single hydranth, enlarged; 3, mouth, surrounded by tentacles; 4, ovicells.

Tubulidentate.
Part of Tooth of Aardvark (Oryzomys capensis), in cross section, highly magnified.

tub-wheel (tub'hwēl), n. 1. A form of water-wheel which has a vertical axis and radial spiral floats placed between two cases attached to the axis. The water is precipitated between the cases from a chute, and is discharged at the bottom of the wheel. E. H. Knight.—2. In tanning, a hollow revolving drum in which skins or leather are washed by being tumbled in water. Similar wheels are used in other industries.

Tub-wheel, r.

tucan (tū'kan), n. [< Mex. tucan (Hernandez).] The Mexican pocket-gopher, Geomys mericanus. It is one of the largest gophers, 10 or 11 inches long, or, with the tail, from 13 to 14 inches, and resembles the quachil, but has soft, sleek fur. The incisors are each bisected by a single median furrow, which distinguishes the animal from all United States gophers except G. castaneus. The tail and feet are clothed as usual in the genus. The coloration is a pure chestnut brown, the hind feet and tail are mostly whitish, and sometimes there are small white patches on the under parts. The under fur is plumbeous, and some specimens vary from the normal chestnut to a plumbeous or anthracite color. Also tucan, tuca, tuza.

Tucana (tū-kā'nū), n. [NL. < toucan, q. v.] 1. A southern constellation, the Toucan, south of the Phoenix, made by Petrus Theodori in the fifteenth century.—2. In ornith., same as Ramphastos. Brisson, 1760.

tucet (tū'set), n. [< L. tucetum, tucetum, a thick gravy; see tucket.] A steak. See tucket 2.

The Cisalpine tucets or goblets of condited bull's flesh. Jer. Taylor, Sermons (1653), p. 212. (Latham.)

tucht, n. An obsolete spelling of touch.

tuck¹ (tuk), v. [< ME. tucken, tucken, also tonken; partly < AS. tucian, pull, pluck, full (cloth); partly < MLG. tucken, Lt. tucken, tokken, pull up, draw up, tuck up, also entire, Lt. also tuden, wrinkle, as a badly made garment, = MD. tucken, entire, = OHG. zuechen, zucken, MIHG. G. zucken, zücken, draw in, draw together, shrug, etc.; a secondary form of the verb represented by AS. tēon (pret. teah, pl. tegon) = OS. tīahan = MLG. tūn, tēn, Lt. tēn = OHG. zīohen, MIHG. G. zūhen = Goth. tīahan, draw; see tecl, and cf. toyl, tug, tigh, tuch. Hence *tucker*¹, *tucker*².] I. trans. 1. To draw close together; pull together. Specifically—(a) To thicken; full: said of cloth. Compare tucking-mill. [Now prov. Eng.] Cloth that cometh from the weyning is nougt come to were tyl it is fulled vnder fote, or in fylling-stokkes, . . . Ytoked, and ytented. Piers Plowman (B), xv. 447.

(b) To gather up; draw or pull up, or in any direction; draw into folds; frequently followed by up.

And you tucke nat your gowne rounde aboute you, you shall be daggled by yonde all mercy. Palsgrave, p. 763. They tuck up the skirts of their coats when they fight or march. Steady, Travaux, p. 38.

She tuckt her girle about her middle, And ranne close by his side. The Knight and Shepherd's Daughter (Child's Ballads, III. 262).

So, Dick Adept, tuck back thy hair; And I will pour into thy ear Remarks, which none did e'er disclose. Prior, Alma, iii.

(c) In needlework, to lay and sew tucks in; as, the waist was tucked lengthwise. See *tuck*¹, n. 2.

2. To press or crowd into a narrow space or compass; stuff; cram.

I . . . carry pistols about me, which I have always tucked within my girdle. Steele, Tatler, No. 164.

They [footmen] would come to an honest labourer's cottage, eat his pancakes, tuck his fowls into their pockets, and came the poor man himself. Manselton, St. Denis and St. George.

The little ens-lions tucked in around her spine were of silks-covered eider-down. The Century, XL. 269.

Hence—3. To pack in barrels. [Prov. Eng.] 150 hogheads [of pitchblende] were tucked on Sunday. Morant's Chronicle, Aug. 28, 1857. (Encyc. Diet.)

4. To gird; clothe tightly or compactly; hence, to cover snugly with wrappings, as with bed-clothes or rugs.

He departed from Elaise and com to Predigan, and he was tucked, and on his heede a felt, and bar a longe staff on his bakke, and he was skender and lene. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 279.

A bonnie lassie she was, very well tuckt up in a risset petticoate. Gleason's Vision.

The pigeons were snugly put to bed in a comfortable pie, and tucked in with a coverlet of crust. Fleming, Sketch-Book, p. 128.

5. To put into one's stomach; eat; usually with in. [Slang.]—6. In seine-fishing, to gather or draw (fish) out of a seine by means of a tuck-seine which is shot inside of the seine.

Tucking the fish is the next operation, and this is performed with the tuck-seam, which we described as being very deep in the middle. Encyc. Brit., IX. 254.

71. To pinch; nip; wound by the pressure of the finger-nail.

If any of the Freshmen came off dull, or not cleverly (in speaking), some of the forward or pragmatical Seniors would tuck them—that is, set the nail of their Thumb to their chin, just under the Lipp, and by the help of their other Fingers under the Chin they would give him a Mark which sometimes would produce blood. Life of A. Wood (by himself), p. 45.

To tuck up. (a) To gather or draw up. (b) To string up; hang. [Slang.]

I never saw an execution but once, and then the hangman asked the poor creature's pardon, and wiped his mouth as you do, and pleaded his duty, and then calmly tucked up the criminal. Richardson, Pamela, I. 141. (Davies.)

II. intrans. 1. To contract; draw together.

An ulcer discharging a nasty thin ichor, the edges tuck in, and, growing skinned and hard, give it the name of a callous ulcer. Sharp, Surgery.

2. To make tucks; as, a sewing-machine that tucks and gathers.

tuck¹ (tuk), n. [*< tuck*¹, v.] 1†. A garment tucked, girt, or wrapped about one; in the following quotation, a turban.

Vpon his head a goodly white tucke, containing in length by estimation fiftene yards. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 113.

2. In needlework, a flat fold in a fabric, or in a part of a garment, fixed in place by stitches, and frequently one of a series laid parallel. Tucks are used either by way of decoration, or in order to dispose of extra material in a garment, with a view to letting it out as the wearer grows or as the fabric shrinks.

3. A short pinfold. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

—4. In bookbinding, a flap on one side of the cover, made to fold over the other side and tuck into a strap which holds it fast.—5. A kind of net.

The Tucke . . . is narrower meshed, and (therefore scarce law full) with a long bunt in the midst. R. Carey, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 30.

6†. A pinch; a nip. See the quotation under *tuck*¹, v. 1, 7.

tuck³ (tuk), v. i. [*< tuck*³, n.] To beat; tap; said of a drum.

The armies met, the trumpet sounds, The dandring drums aloud did tuck. Battle of Harlaw (Child's Ballads, VII. 186).

tuckahoe (tuk'a-hō), n. [Formerly also tuckahough; from an Amer. Ind. name represented by Delaware ptucqui, a (round) loaf or cake, < petukqui, Cree pettikwaw, round, globular.] 1†. Formerly, either of the plants the Virginia wake-robin, Peltandra undulata (P. Virginica, once Arum Virginicum), and the golden-club, Orontium aquaticum, both aquatics with deep fleshy and starchy rootstocks, which, rendered edible by cooking, were used by the Indians of Virginia as food.

They [the aborigines of Virginia] have two roots; . . . the other called Tuckahough, growing like a flagge, of the greatnes and taste of a Potato, which passeth a fiery purgation before they may eate it, being poyson whiles it is raw. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 761.

2. A subterranean fungus, Pachyma Cocos, otherwise known as Indian bread, Indian head, and Indian loaf, found widely in the southern United States. It grows in light leamy soils on old roots as a saprophyte, or perhaps a parasite. Its size, form, and bark-like exterior give it the outward appearance of a cocoa-a, a root with growth of tuckahoe; b, mass of tuckahoe; c, microscopical section of the same.

nut; within it presents a compact white mass without apparent structure. When first taken from the ground, it is moist and yielding; but in drying the white substance becomes very hard, cracking from within. It is entirely tasteless, insoluble in water, without starch, and is composed in large measure of pectose.

tuck-creaser (tuk'krē'sēr), n. An attachment to a sewing-machine which creases the fabric as it passes through the machine, in order to make a guiding line for the next tuck. It usually consists essentially of an adjustable spring-bar.

St. Nicholas, XVIII. 125.

tuck-seine (tuk'sän), n. A small fishing-seine used in tucking. It is from seventy to eighty fathoms long, eight fathoms at the wings, and ten fathoms in the middle or bunt. See *tuck*¹, v. t., 6.

tuck-shop (tuk'shop), n. A shop where tuck or food, particularly sweet stuff, pastry, etc., is sold. [Slang.]

Come along down to Sally Harrowell's; that's our school-house tuck-shop—she bakes such stunning muffins.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, I. 6.

tuck-stick (tuk'stik), n. A sword-cane or dagger-cane.

tucum (tö'kum), n. [Braz.] A Brazilian palm, Astracaryum vulgare. It is of great importance to the Indians, who make cordage, bowstrings, fishing nets, etc., from the fine durable fiber consisting of the epidermis of its unexpanded leaves. Hammocks, hats, fans, etc., are also fabricated of this thread. The pulp of the fruit yields an oil useful in many ways. Its products are known as tucum-fiber or thread and tucum-oil. Tecun appears to be a form of this name.

tucuma (tö'kö-mü), n. [Braz.] A palm, Astracaryum Tucuma, allied to the tucum, affording a less-used fiber and a fruit prized by the natives. Another related species, A. tucumoides, bears the same name.

tucu-tucu (tö'kü-tö'kü), n. [Braz.] A small rodent of South America, Ctenomys brasiliensis, belonging to the family Octodontidae. It is of nocturnal habits, lives underground, forms extensive burrows, and is about as large as the common rat, with fur like that of a squirrel. Also tucu-tucu, tuko-tuko. See cut under Ctenomyia.

-tude. [< F. -tude = Sp. Pg. -tud = It. -tudin, < L. -tudo (-tudin), a formative of abstract fem. nouns from adjectives, as amplitudo, largeness, < amplus, large.] A suffix of many nouns of Latin origin, as amplitude, latitude, aptitude, attitude, lassitude, rectitude, torpitude, etc.

tufa (tö'fü), n. [< It. tufa, calcareous rock, tufa: see *tuff*³.] A rock having a rough or cellular texture, sometimes a fragmental volcanic material, and sometimes a calcareous deposit from springs. The word tufa is rarely used by English geologists except with the epithet calcareous, when it has the same meaning as the tufus of Virgil and Pliny, or the travertine of the modern Italians. See travertine and *tuff*³.

Calcareous tufa, travertine, pisolite, ostecolla, &c., are deposits formed by the chemical precipitation of carbonate of lime from waters holding bicarbonate of lime in solution.

Rutley, Study of Rocks, xiv.

tufaceous (tö'fä'shius), a. [< It. tufaceo, < L. tufaceus, tufaceus, < tufus, sandstone: see *tuff*³, tufa, toph.] Made up of tufa, or resembling it in a greater or less degree.

tuff¹ (tuf), n. [< ME. tuffe (cf. tuff), < OF. tuffe, F. touffe, aggregation or bunch of trees, flowers, feathers, etc., prob. < OHG. zopf, MHG. G. zopf, top, tuff, = LG. topp = D. top = E. top: see *top*¹. Cf. OF. top (= Sp. tope = It. toppa), F. dim. toupet (> E. toupet, touper), tuft, crest, bunch of hair: from the LG. forms of the same word. Hence *tuff*², q. v.] Same as *tuff*². Hallwell.

tuff² (tuf), a. An old spelling of tough.

tuff³ (tuf), n. [< F. tuf, formerly also tuffa, soft stone, < It. tufa, soft stone, tufa, tufa, < L. tophus, tufus, a soft sandy stone. Cf. toph, tufa.] A volcanic fragmental rock, varying from coarse deposits made of materials resembling fine gravel in size to those which are like the finest sand. Considerable tufa is being similar in composition to peperino, but being the marks of having been transported by and deposited from water. The tufus of Vitruvius and Columella was of volcanic origin; that of Virgil and Pliny was calcareous. The tufus of the Italians, at the present time, is volcanic, and is the same rock which was designated by the Romans as lapus ruber; it closely resembles peperino (the lapus Albanus of the Romans), and does not differ, except in color and degree of compactness, from the modern speciosa (Lupinus luteus), or from the so-called monziana (Lupinus latifolius). These are all fragmental rocks made up of more or less firmly compacted volcanic clinders and ashes, and are all included under the term tuft as used by English geologists.

tuft-cone (tuft'kōn), n. A conical elevation made up of ashes or other fragmentary eruptive material accumulated around a volcanic orifice.

The materials of a tuft-cone are arranged in more or less regularly stratified beds.

tula (töl'li), n. [Mex. (?)]. Same as istle.

tulasi (töl'la-si), n. [Telugu.] Same as toolsi.

tula-work (töl'li-work), n. Niello; niello-work; a kind of decorative work somewhat similar to enameling, done chiefly on silver. Niello-work has been long known, and is described by Pliny, by whom its invention is attributed to the Egyptians. It differs from enamel in that this latter is a vitreous compound, while niello is a combination of sulphur with silver, copper, and lead, the relative proportion of the ingredients, as given by different authors, varying greatly. The composition of niello, according to Pliny, is three parts of silver with one of copper, and no lead. All the more modern recipes demand less silver and more lead, the quantity of the precious metal diminishing from century to century. Benvenuto Cellini gives one sixth silver, one third copper, and one half lead as the composition of niello. The above has reference to the metallic ingredients of this article; in its manufacture sulphur is generally added in excess, that which is not taken up by the metals being volatilized in the process, which is performed in a crucible, a little sal ammoniac being used as a flux. Niello-work has been done in Russia for many years, and especially at Tula, which is the best-known locality for this branch of decorative art, although it is said that more artistic specimens are turned out at other places in that country. Niello is called in Russia "black silver." See niello.

tulchan, tulchin (tul'chan, -chin), n. [Origin obscure.] A calf's skin stuffed with straw, and set beside a cow, to make her give her milk: used formerly in Scotland. Tulchan bishops, a name derivatively applied to the persons appointed as titular bishops to the Scottish sees immediately after the Reformation, in whose names the revenues of the sees were drawn by the lay barons who had appropriated them. Carlyle, Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, Int., iv. [Scotch.]

tule (töl'le), n. [Amer. Sp.] A bulrush or club-rush of either of two species which in California and adjacent regions occupy large areas of overflowed bottom-land and marsh. One of these is the common bulrush, Scirpus lacustris, which there, in the variety occidentalis, becomes sometimes 8 or 10 feet high and an inch or more thick at the base. The other species is the very similar S. Tatora, found eastward to Louisiana, and also in South America. See Scirpus (with cut).

tule-wren (töl'le-ren), n. A kind of marsh-wren, Cistothorus or Telmatoedyles palustris, var. paludicola, which abounds in the tule-marshes of California.

tulip (tū'lip), n. [Formerly also tulpe, tulpie, also tulpa; = MD. tulpe, D. tulp = G. tulpe = L. tulp, < OF. tulipe, tulippe, F. tulipe = OSP. tulipa = Pg. tulipa = It. tulipa (NL. tulipa); also MD. tulpaun = Dan. tulipan = Sw. tulpan, < OF. tulipan = Sp. tulipan = R. tulipano, a tulip; so called from its likeness to a turban; a particular use of OF. tulipan, tulipant, tulpant, etc., > E. tulipant, etc., NL. tulipa, etc., a turban; see turban.] 1. A plant of the genus Tulipa, of which several species are well-known garden bulbs with highly colored bell-shaped flowers, blooming in spring. The common garden tulips are derived chiefly from T. Gesneriana, a native of central and southern Europe and adjacent parts of Asia, having shining scarlet flowers with purple-black spots at the base of the divisions, or a partly yellow claw. Varieties of this species have been developed with great care, especially in the Netherlands, the seat at one time of a "tulipomania." The catalogue of a Haarlem florist of recent date offered 1,800 varieties. They are divided into four classes; namely, "bicolors" or "self-flowers," with the natural plain color; "bizarres," having a clear yellow ground with red, brown, lilac, maroon, or purple markings; "byblomems," with a white background marked prevalently with red or shades of purple; and "roses," with white background variegated with shades of rose-color, deep-red, or scarlet. It is said that when a self-tulip once "breaks," the new variety remains always the same. Another long-cultivated tulip is the Duc Van Thol, T. saureolus, with fragrant scarlet, yellow, or variegated flowers, early, and especially suited for pot-culture and forcing. T. precox, having scarlet flowers with large black-purple spots surrounded with yellow near the base, also affords varieties. Less conspicuous or less known species are T. Oculus-solis, the sun's-eye tulip, with a brilliant scarlet perianth, having black spots at the base of the segments; T. australis (T. Colbianna), with bright yellow flowers smaller than the common kinds; T. Clusiana, low and delicate, having the three inner divisions pure white, the three outer stained with pink; T. pulchella, type of a group of very pretty dwarf species; and T. Greigi, the Turkestan tulip, one of the most showy and desirable of all known tulips, bearing goblet-shaped flowers, commonly of a vivid orange-scarlet hue, also purple or yellow, from 4 to 6 inches broad when fully expanded.

2. In ordnance, a bell-shaped outward swell of the muzzle of a gun, as a rule abandoned in modern ordnance.

The armament of the Collingwood consists of four 45-ton steel breech-loading guns, 27 ft. 4 in. long, and gradually tapering from a diameter of 4 ft. 7 in. at the breech to 17 in. near the muzzle, which possesses what artificers call a tulip or "swell." The Engineer, LXVIII, 314.

African tulip, a plant of the genus Hemanthus.—Butterfly-tulip, the mariposa-lily or pretty-grass, Calochortus, of California.—Capet tulip. (a) See Hemanthus. (b) A lilaceous plant, Grewia columbata (Tulipa Bregmiana), of the Cape of Good Hope.—Chekered tulip, drooping tulip. See wild tulip (a), below.—Duc Van Thol tulip. See def. 1.—Parrot-tulip, varieties of T. acuminata (T. Turcica), of a dwarf habit, with the petals curved and fantastically fringed, variegated, partly green, the form and color suggesting the name; also, a variety of the common tulip; the former sometimes distinguished as Florentine parrot-tulip.—Sun's-eye tulip. See def. 1.—Turkestan tulip. See def. 1.—Van Thol tulip. Short for Duc Van Thol tulip. See above.—Wild tulip. (a) In England, Tulipa sylvestris, the only native species; also, provincially, the guinea-hen plant, Fritillaria Meleagris, similarly called chekered and drooping tulip. (b) In California, same as butterfly-tulip; see above.

Tulipa (tū'li-pä), n. [NL. (Malpighi, 1675; earlier by Lobel, 1576); see tulip.] 1. A genus of lilaceous plants, the tulips, type of the tribe Tulipeæ. It is characterized by flowers which are usually erect, bell-shaped, and marked by spots near the base, but without nectar-bearing glands; and by oblong, linear, erect, basifixed anthers. There are about 50 species, natives of Europe and Asia, extending from England to Japan, and southward into northern Africa. They are bulbous plants, with a simple stem bearing few leaves, linear or broader, and a handsome solitary flower, rarely two or three. See tulip.

2t. [l. c.] A tulip.

tulipanti, n. An obsolete form of turban.

Tulipeæ (tū'li-pé-é), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1845), < Tulipa + -æ.] A tribe of lilaceous plants, characterized by solitary or loosely racemed flowers, and a leaf-bearing stem produced from a coated or scaly bulb. It includes over 200 species belonging to 7 genera, of which Tulipa is the type. They are natives of north temperate regions, usually producing large and handsome flowers. The tribe includes the lily, crown-imperial, tulip, dog-tooth violet or adder's tongue, and mariposa-lily. The genera Lilium, Erythronium, and Lloydia are partly American, and Calochortus wholly so; for the others, see Fritillaria, Gagea, and Tulipa.

tulip-ear (tū'lip-ér), n. An upright or prick-ear in dogs. Shaw.

tulip-eared (tū'lip-é-éd), a. Prick-eared, as a dog.

tulipiet, n. An obsolete form of tulip.

tulipist (tū'lip-ist), n. [< tulip + -ist.] A cultivator of tulips. Sir P. Broome, Urn-burial, Ep. Ded.

tulipomania (tū'li-pō-mā'ni-ä), n. [= F. tulipomanie (Ménage); as E. tulip + Gr. parva, madness; see mania.] The D. term is tulpanhandel, tulip-trade. A craze for the cultivation or acquisition of tulips; specifically, that which arose in the Netherlands about the year 1634, seized on all classes like an epidemic, and led to disasters such as result from great financial catastrophes. Tulip-marts were established in various towns, where roots were sold and resold as stocks on the exchange. A single root of Superbus Augustus was sold for 13,000 florins. After several years the government found it necessary to interfere.

tulipomaniac (tū'li-pō-mā'ni-äk), n. [< tulipomania + -iac.] One who is affected with tulipomania. H. Spencer, Education, p. 66.

tulip-poplar (tū'lip-pop-lär), n. Same as tulip-tree.

tulip-root (tū'lip-rüt), n. A disease of oats, caused by a nematoid worm of the family Anguillulidae, Tylenchus decastatrix, which causes the base of the stem to swell until it somewhat resembles a tulip-bulb.

tulip-shell (tū'lip-shel), n. A shell of the family Fasciolaridae; specifically, Fasciolaria tulipa. See ent under Fasciolaria.

tulip-tree (tū'lip-tré), n. A tree, Liriodendron Tulipifera, found in North America, where, among deciduous trees, it is surpassed in size only by the sycamore (Platanus occidentalis) and the bald cypress (Taxodium distichum). A tree believed to be identical with it is found in China. The wood is soft, fine, and straight-grained, and is easily worked; it is used in construction and for inside finish, cabinet-work, pumps, woodenware, etc. The bark, especially of the root, is acrid and bitter, and is used domestically as a stimulant tonic. The tulip-tree is quite hardy, and is a much-admired shade and ornamental tree. Its timber, or the tree itself, is known as schittwood, though the wood turns yellowish on exposure, and as poplar, tulip-poplar, or yellow poplar. An old name, saddle-tree or saddle-bark, refers to the form of the leaf; another, canoe-wood, to the use in which it was found among the Indians. The present name (the best of the common names) has reference to the flowers, which in form and size resemble a large tulip, the petals greenish-yellow marked with orange. See Liriodendron (with cut).

The large tulip tree, which we call a poplar.

Beverley, Hist. Virginia, iv, § 18.

Chinese tulip-tree. (a) The North American tree defined above. (b) Mitchella (Magnolia) fuscata.—Laurel-leaved tulip-tree, the magnolia, especially Magnolia grandiflora (M. latifolia).—Queensland tulip-tree. See Stenocarpus.—Tulip-tree of the West Indies, Hibiscus (Paritium) clausus, a tree of the size of the horse-chestnut, with large flowers, which are pale primrose-color in the morning, and become orange and deep-red as the day advances.

tulip-wood (tū'lip-wüd), n. 1. The wood of the tulip-tree.—2. One of several other woods, so called from their color and markings. (a) A choice rose-colored and striped wood imported into Europe from Brazil, the product of Physocalymma floribundum. It is used for inlaying costly furniture, in turnery, etc. (b) See Harpallia. (c) See Oreocla.

tultk, n. [ME., also tolt, < Icel. tulk, an interpreter, spokesman, broker, = Dan. Sw. tolk = MD. tolch, D. tolk = M.G. tolk, tulk, an interpreter, prob. (the D. and I.G. through the Scand.) < Lith. tulkas, an interpreter. See talk.] A man.

tumbeki (tûm'bek-i), n. [Turk.; see tobacco.] A kind of tobacco exported from Persia. Also written tumbeki.

tumbester (tum'bes-tér), n. [ME. also tumbester, tumbester, tumbester, tumbester; < tumb + -ster.] A female tumbler or dancer. As the professional dancers of medieval times were usually also tumblers or acrobats, the words for dance and tumble were commonly used as synonymous. (Compare hop, dance, hopsie, a female dancer, Latin saltator, saltatrix, a dancer, literally 'leaper'.) The daughter of Herodias, who danced before Herod, is often pictured in medieval art as tumbling, walking on her hands, or standing on her head. Compare tumbler, 5.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 288.

2. [cap.] One of the religious sect known as Dunkers. See Dunker.—3. A breed of domestic pigeons which perform certain aerial evolutions called tumbling, during which they fall through the air for a distance before making play with their wings. This performance is an exaggeration of the sweeping or gyrating flight characteristic of wild pigeons, and an approach to it may be shown by any pigeons, for example, a hawk dashes into a flock. Tumblers have a short round head with high forehead and very short beak.

Hence—2. A pompous or bombastic style; turquidness; fustian.

tumidly (tū'mid-lī), adv. In a tumid manner or form.

tumidness (tū'mid-nes), n. The state of being tumid, in any sense. = Syn. Bathos, Fustian, etc. See bombast.

tumika-oil (tū'mi-kā-oil), n. A concrete fixed oil from the seeds of the wild mangosteen, Diospyros Embryophris.

tummer (tum'ēr), n. A connecting cylinder in a carding-machine.

tumor, tumour (tū'mōr), n. [< F. tumeur = Sp. Pg. tumor = It. tumore, < L. tumor, a swelling, the state of being swollen, < tumere, swell; see tumid.] 1. A swell or rise of any kind. [Rare.]

One tumour drown'd another, billows strove
To outswell ambition, water air outdrove.

B. Jonson, Prince Henry's Barriers.

2. In med.: (a) A swelling; one of the four necessary accompaniments, according to the older pathologists, of inflammation—namely, calor, dolor, rubor, et tumor (heat, pain, redness, and swelling). (b) An abnormal prominence existing upon any of the cutaneous, mucous, or serous surfaces in any part of the body, and not due to acute inflammation. A tumor is usually a new formation of tissue foreign to the part in which it exists, and is thus distinguished in general from hypertrophy, though a hypertrophy may occasionally be so localized as to constitute a true tumor. A neoplasm is called a tumor when it forms a prominence on any surface. A swelling may be acute or chronic, and may be circumscribed or diffuse; a tumor is a chronic circumscribed swelling.

3. A swelling port or style; tumidity; bombast.

She satiates and fills the mind, without tumour and ostentation. Ecclips, True Religion, II. 174.

Adipose tumor, a lipoma.—Aneurismal tumor, an aneurism.—Apostoli's method for the treatment of fibroid tumor of the uterus, destruction of the tumor by electrolysis.—Benign tumor, a tumor which does not recur, as a rule, after removal, and is not inimical to the life of the patient.—Cavernous tumor, a tumor formed of loosely reticulated tissue.—Dermatoid or dermoid tumor, a cystic tumor the inner wall of which is composed of cutaneous tissue, and which often contains some of the appendages of the skin, such as hair, nails, or even teeth.—Encysted tumor, See encyst.—Erectile tumor, a tumor composed of a vascular tissue resembling erectile tissue.—Fibroid tumor, a tumor composed of fibrous tissue; usually referring to a fibromuscular tumor of the uterus.—Fibroplastic tumor, See spindle-celled sarcoma, under sarcoma.—Floating tumor, a movable body within the abdomen, usually the spleen or a kidney, which has loose attachments, allowing of change of position of the organ.—Gubler's tumor, a prominence on the back of the wrist, seen in cases of wrist-drop from lead-poisoning.—Histoid tumor, a tumor composed of connective tissue.—Malignant tumor, a tumor which tends to recur after removal, and eventually to cause the patient's death.—Margaroid tumor, cholesteatoma.—Mixed tumor, a tumor composed of more than one kind of tissue.—Ovarian tumor, See ovarian.—Phantom tumor, a circumscribed abdominal swelling, occurring usually in hysterical women, due to muscular contraction or to an accumulation of intestinal gases. The swelling commonly disappears when the patient is asleep or under the influence of an anæsthetic. It is sometimes very deceptive in its appearance, and has not infrequently been mistaken for pregnancy.—Sand tumor, psammoma; so called because of the sand-like calcareous matter which it contains.

—Teratoid tumor. Same as teratoma.—Thomas's operation for the removal of uterine fibroid tumors, See operation.—Transition tumor, See transition.—Tumor albus, tuberculous synovitis, especially of the knee-joint; white-swellings.—Vascular tumor, See vascular.—Warty tumor, See warty.

tumored, tumoured (tū'mōr'd), n. [< tumor + -ed.] Affected with a tumor or tumors; swollen; tumid; distended. [Rare.]

I might behold his legs tumored and swol'd.

Heaven, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 362.

tumorous (tū'mōr-us), a. [= Pg. It. tumerosa, < L. tumerosus, swollen, inflated, bloated, < L. tumor, a swelling; see tumor.] 1. Swelling; protuberant.

Who ever saw any cypress or pine small below and above and tumorous in the middle, unless some diseased plant? Sir H. Wotton.

2. Vainly pompous; bombastic, as language or style; fustian.

According to their subject these styles vary; . . . for that which is high and lofty, declaring excellent matter, becomes vast and tumorous, speaking of petty and inferior things. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

tumour, tumoured. See tumor, tumored.

tump (tump), n. [< W. tump, a round mass, a hillock; cf. L. tumulus, a mound; see tumulus, tomb.] A little hillock; a heap; a clump.

He stopped his little nag short of the crest, and got off and looked ahead of him from behind a tump of whortles. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xxxi.

tump (tump), v. t. [< tump, n.] In hort., to form a mass of earth or a hillock round (a plant); as, to tump teazel.

tump-line (tump'lin), n. [Perhaps a corruption, among the Canadian Indians and the French voyageurs, of *L. temple-line (or of a corresponding F. term), < temple (F. temple) + line.] A strap by which a pack is carried across a portage or through the woods. It crosses the forehead, the advantage being that its use in this position leaves the hands free for clearing the way with an ax or otherwise; it is frequently shifted in position so as to cross the breast, for temporary relief. This method of carrying is common through the St. Lawrence valley and to the furthest Northwest, alike among whites, half-breeds, and Indians. The term is used in Maine and on its borders; elsewhere the strap is called portage-strap or pack-strap.

tumpy (tum'pi), a. [< tump + -y.] Abounding in tumps or hillocks; uneven. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

tum-tum (tum'tum), n. [Appar. ult. imitative of the beating of a drum; cf. *tum*² and tom-tom.] 1. A favorite dish in the West Indies, made by beating boiled plantains quite soft in a wooden mortar. It is eaten like a potato-pudding, or made into round cakes and fried.—2. Same as tom-tom.

tumular (tū'mū-lār), a. [< F. tumulaire, as if < *L. tumularis, < tumulus, a mound; see tumulus.] Same as tumulary. Pinkerton.

tumulary (tū'mū-lār-i), a. [As tumular, q. v.] Consisting in a heap; formed or being in a heap or hillock.

tumulate¹ (tū'mū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. tumulated, ppr. tumulating. [< L. tumulatus, pp. of tumulari, cover with a mound, entomb, < tumulus, a mound; see tumulus.] To cover with a mound; bury.

His heart begins to rise, and his passions to tumulate and ferment into a storm. Ep. Wilkins, Nat. Religion, i. 17.

tumuli, n. Plural of tumulus.

tumulose, tumulous (tū'mū-lōs, -lus), a. [< L. tumulosus, full of mounds or hills, < tumulus, a mound; see tumulus.] Full of mounds or hills. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

tumulosity (tū'mū-lōs'it-i), n. [< tumulose + -ity.] The state of being tumulous. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

tumulous, a. See tumulose.

tumult (tū'mult), n. [< F. tumulte = Pr. tumult = Sp. Pg. It. tumulto, < L. tumultus, commotion, disturbance, tumult, < tumere, swell, be excited; see tumid.] 1. The commotion, disturbance, or agitation of a multitude, usually accompanied with great noise, uproar, and confused talking; an uproar; hence, a noisy uprising, as of a mob.

What meaneth the noise of this tumult? 1 Sam. iv. 14.

There is this difference between the tumults here [in Cairo] and those at Constantinople, that the latter are commonly begun by some resolute fellows among the janizaries, whereas here the mob is generally raised by some great man, who envies one that is a rival to him.

Pococke, Description of the East, I. 169.

2. Violent commotion or agitation, with confusion of sounds.

In this piece of poetry, what can be nobler than the idea it gives us of the Supreme Being thus raising a tumult among the elements, and recovering them out of their confusion, thus troubling and becalming nature?

Addison, Spectator, No. 489.

3. Agitation; high excitement; irregular or confused motion.

The tumult in her mind seemed not yet abated.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xix.

= Syn. Disturbance, turbulence, confusion, hubbub, ferment, outbreak, melee.

tumultus (tū-mul'tus), n. [L., commotion, tumult; see tumult.] Commotion; irregular action.

—Tumultus cordis, irregular action of the heart.

—Tumultus sermonis, a form of aphasia in which the patient stutters when reading aloud.

tumulus (tū'mū-lus), n.; pl. tumuli (-lī). [< L. tumulus, a mound, < tumere, swell; see tumid. Cf. *tump*¹ and tomb.] A sepulchral mound, as the famous Mound of Marathon raised over the bodies of those Athenians who fell in repelling the invading Persians; a barrow; very frequently, a mound covering and inclosing a more or less elaborate structure of masonry. The raising of mounds over the tombs of the dead, particularly of distinguished persons, or those slain in battle, was a usual practice among very many peoples from the most remote antiquity.

tun¹ (tun), n. [Also ton (now used only in the sense of a measure); early mod. E. tunne, tunne, < ME. tunne, tonne, < AS. tunne = MD. tonne, D. ton = Ollg. tunna, MHG. tunne, G. tunne = Teut. tunne = Sw. tunna, OSw. tynna = Dan. tünde; cf. F. tonne (dim. tonneau, OF. tonnel = Pr. Sp. Pg. dim. tonel), ML. tunna, Ir. and Gael. tunna; root unknown; it is uncertain whether the Teut. or the Celtic forms are original. Hence tunnel.] 1. A large cask for holding liquids, especially wine, ale, or beer. *See tun*¹.

As who so filled a tonne of a fresshe ryner.

And went forth with that water to wake with [add water to] Themese. Piers Plowman (B), xv. 331.

Take four and twenty bucks and ewes,

And ten tun of the wine.

Childe Yvet (Child's Ballads, II. 75).

She drank. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 159.

3. In a brewery, the fermenting-vat or -tank. E. H. Knight.—4. A measure of capacity, equal by old statutes to 252 wine-gallons. There was a local tun of beer in London of 2 butts, and a customary tun of sweet oil was 236 gallons, and of syrup $3\frac{1}{2}$ barrels. As all measures of capacity are regarded by metrologists as having been defined first by weight, some have supposed the tun was originally a short ton weight of water.

5. In conch., a shell of the genus Dolium or family Dolidae; a tun-shell.—6. The upper part of a chimney; also, the chimney itself. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

My newe hous with the iij. tunnyis of chemeneyis.

Bury Wille (ed. Tynmms), p. 20.

Bolt and tun, in her. See bolt.

tun¹ (tūn), v. t.: pret. and pp. tunned, ppr. tunning. [< tun¹, n.] 1. To store in a tun or tuns, as wine or malt liquor; hence, to store in vessels of any sort for keeping.

Amongst the rest with the apples of Adam; the juice whereof they tun up and send into Turkey.

Sandys, Travaux, p. 175.

2*f.* To fill as if a tun.

A vale of tears, a vessel tun'd with breath,

By sickness branch'd, to be drawn out by death.

Quarles, Emblems, iii. 8.

3. To mingle with liquor when it is stored, as for the purpose of flavoring it, or making it keep better.

The women of our northern parts do tun the herb ache-hue into their ale.

Gerard's Herball (1579), quoted by Bickerdyke, p. 63.

tun^{2*f.*}, n. An obsolete form of tuna.

tuna¹ (tū'nā), n. A fish. See Thynnus, Sarda, Oreopus, and tunny.

tuna² (tū'nā), n. A species of prickly-pear, Opuntia Tuna, or its fruit. It grows erect, sometimes 20 feet high, is spiny, and is much used for hedges in southern Europe. Its fruit, which is barrel shaped and 2 or 3 inches long, is much eaten, fresh and dried. It is one of the foremost cochineal-plants, and is said to be the only species used for this production in the Canaries.

tunable (tū'nā-bl), a. [Also tuncable; < tune + -able.] 1. Capable of being put in tune, or made harmonious.

God ringing the changes on all accidents, and making them tunable to His glory.

Fuller, Holy State, IV. xiii. 12.

2. Harmonious; musical; tuneful. [Rare.]

More tunable than lark to shepherd's ear.

Shak., M. N. D., i. 1. 184.

Their great huge rowling tunbellied god Bacchos.

Cartwright, Royal Slave (1631). (Nares.)

tun-belly (tun'bel'i), n. A large protuberant belly.

A double chin and a tun-belly.

Tom Brown, Works, III. 152. (Davies.)

tun-dish (tun'dish), n. A funnel.

Filling a bottle with a tun-dish.

Shak., M. for M., iii. 2. 182.

tundra (tūn'drū), n. [Also tuundra; < Russ. tundra, a marshy plain.] In the northern part of Russia (both in Europe and in Asia), one of the nearly level tree-less areas which occupy most of that region, and do not differ essentially from the steppes, except that, lying further north, their climate and vegetation are more decidedly arctic than those of the country to the south, with a corresponding increase in the number of small lakes and morasses.

A short distance south of Yefremov Kamen begins the veritable tundra, a woodless plain, interrupted by no mountain heights, with small lakes scattered over it, and narrow valleys crossing it, which often make an excursion on the apparently level plain extremely tiresome.

Nordenskiöld, Voyage of the Vega (trans.), 1. 377.

tundun (tun'dun), n. A toy: same as bull-roarer. tune (tūn), n. [< ME. tunc; < OF. ton, F. ton = Pr. ton = Sp. tono = It. tuono, < L. tonus, < Gr. τῶνος, a tone: see *tone*¹, of which tune is a doublet.] 1. A sound, especially a musical tone.

Leave your betraying smiles,

And change the tunes of your enticing tongue

To penitential prayers.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, iii. 3.

Whose senses in so evil consort their stupide Nature lays That ravishing delight in them most sweet tunes doth not raise.

Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 570).

2. A well-rounded and pleasing succession of tones; an air; a melody; especially, a brief melodic piece in simple metrical form. The term is often extended to include the harmony with which such a melody is accompanied. Specifically—3. A musical setting of a hymn, usually in four-part harmony, intended for use in public worship; a hymn-tune; chorale.—4. Same as entr'acte. Sometimes called an act.

tune,—5. Correct intonation in singing or playing on an instrument; capacity for producing tones in correct intonation; the proper construction or adjustment of a musical instrument with reference to such intonation; mutual adaptation of voices or instruments in pitch and temperament.

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh.

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 1. 166.

A continual Parliament (I thought) would but keep the Common-weal in tune, by preserving Laws in their due execution and vigour.

Eikon Basilike, p. 27.

6. Frame of mind; mood; temper, especially temper for the time being; as, to be in tune (to be in the right disposition, or fit temper or humor).

The poor distressed Lear's i' the town;

Who sometime, in his better tune, remembers

What we are come about. Shak., Lear, iv. 3. 41.

7. In phren., one of the perceptive faculties, of which the organ is said to be situated above the external angle of the orbit of the eye, as high as the middle of the forehead, on each side of the temporal ridge. This faculty is claimed to give the perception of melody or harmony. See phrenology.—In tune, in correct or properly adjusted intonation; harmonious.—Out of tune, in incorrect or improperly adjusted intonation; inharmonious.—To change one's tune, to alter one's manner and way of talking.

O gin I live and bruik my life,

I'll gar ye change your tune.

Wedding of Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, [V. 184].)

To sing another tune. See sing.—To the tune of, to the sum or amount of. [Colloq.]

Will Hazard has got the hipps, having lost to the tune of five hundred pound, tho' he understands play very well, no body better.

Swift, Tatler, No. 230.

tune (tūn), v.: pret. and pp. tuned, ppr. tuning. [< tunc, n. Cf. attune.] 1. To adjust the tones of (a voice or a musical instrument) with reference to a correct or given standard of pitch or temperament. See tuning.

Tune your harps,

Ye angels, to that sound.

Drayton, Spanish Friar, ii. 1.

2. To play upon; produce melody or harmony from.

When Orpheus tuned his lyre with pleasing woe,

Rivers forgot to run, and winds to blow.

Addison, Epil. to Granville's British Enchanters.

3. To express by means of melody or harmony; celebrate in music.

Fountains, and ye that warble, as ye flow,

Melodious murmurs, warbling tune his praise.

Milton, P. L., v. 196.

4. To give a special tone or character to; attune.

To that high-sounding Lyre I tune my Strains.

Congreve, Pindaric Odes, i.

In peace, Love tunes the shepherd's reed.

Scott, L. of L. M., iii. 2.

5. To put into a state proper for any purpose, or adapted to produce a particular effect.

Come, let me tune you; glaze not thus your eyes

With self-love of a yow'd virginity.

Massinger and Dekker, Virgin-Martyr, ii. 3.

6. To bring into uniformity or harmony.

Elizabeth might silence or tune the pulpits; but it was impossible for her to silence or tune the great preachers of justice, and mercy, and truth.

J. R. Green, Short Hist. Eng., p. 456.

II. intrans. 1. To give forth musical sound.

Tuning to the water's fall,

The small birds sang to her.

Drayton, Quest of Cynthia.

2. To accord with some correct or given standard of pitch or temperament.—3. To utter inarticulate musical sounds with the voice; sing without using words: hum a tune. Imp. Diet. [Rare.]—To tune up, to begin to sing or play; as, birds tune up after a shower. [Colloq.]

tuneable, tuneableness, etc. See tunable, etc. tuned (tūnd), a. [< tune + -ed.] Toned; usually in composition; as, a shrill-tuned bell.

tuneful (tūn'ful), a. [< tune + -ful.] Full of melody or tune. (a) Melodious; sweet of sound.

The tuneful voice was heard from high.

Drayton, Song for St. Cecilia's Day.

(b) Producing sweet sounds; musical.

The Minstrel was indim and old; . . .

His tuneful brethren all were dead.

Scott, L. of L. M., Int.

tunefully (tūn'ful-i), adv. In a tuneful manner; harmoniously; musically.

tunefulness (tūn'ful-nes), n. The state or character of being tuneful.

tuneless (tūn'les), a. [< tune + -less.] 1. Un-musical; inharmonious.

How often have I led thy sportive choir,

With tuneless pipe, beside the murmuring Loire!

Goldsmith, Traveller, l. 244.

2. Not employed in or not capable of making music.

When in hand my tuneless harp I take,

Then doe I more augment my foes despite.

Spenser, Sonnets, xlv.

3. Not expressed rhythmically or musically; silent; without voice or utterance.

On thy voiceless shore

The heroic lay is tuneless now;

The heroic bosom beats no more!

Egdon, Don Juan, iii. 86.

tuner (tū'nēr), n. [< tune + -er.] 1. One who tunes or puts in tune; also, one who makes music or sings.

The pox of such antic, li-ping, affecting fantasticoes, these new tuners of accents!

Shak., R. and J., ii. 4. 30.

Our mournful Philomel,

That rarest tuner.

Drayton, Shepherd's Sirena.

Specifically—2. One whose occupation it is to put musical instruments in proper tune and repair.

There are a good many blind tuners.

J. H. Ewing, Story of a Short Life, viii.

3. In organ-building, an adjustable flap or opening near the top of a flue-pipe, whereby the effective length of the air-column may be altered, so as to alter the pitch of the tone.

tungt, n. An old spelling of tungu.

tung-oil (tung'oil), n. [< Chinese tung + E. oil.] A fixed oil obtained from the seeds of the tung-tree, Albizia cordata, forming 35 per cent. of their weight. It is produced in immense quantities in China, where it is universally employed for calking and painting junks and boats, and for varnishing and preserving all kinds of woodwork. In drying quality it surpasses all other known oils. It is also used for lighting, but is inferior for the purpose to tea-oil. It is not known in European commerce. Also tree-oil or wood-oil. Spens. Encyc. Manuf.

tun-great (tun'grāt), n. [ME. tonne greet; < tun¹ + great.] Having a circumference of the size of a tun.

Every pillar, the temple to sustene,

Was tonne-greet, of iron bright and shene.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1136.

tungstate (tung'stāt), n. [< tungst(ic) + -at¹.] A salt of tungstic acid: as, tungstate of lime.—Sodium tungstate, a crystalline salt prepared by roasting wolfram with soda ash. It is used as a mordant, and to render fabrics inflammable.

tungsten (tung'sten), n. [= F. tungstène = Sp. Fig. It. tungsteno = G. tungstein = Sw. tungsten (= Dan. tungstern), < tung, heavy. = Dan. tung = Ice. thungr, heavy (cf. thungr, a load, thungr, load), + sten, stone. = Dan. sten = G. stein = E. stone, q. v.] 1. Chemical symbol, W; atomic weight, 183.5. A metal some of whose ores have long been known (see wolfram and scheelite), but they were supposed to be compounds of tin.

That scheelite (tungstate of lime) was a compound of lime with a peculiar metallic acid was proved by Scheele and Bergman in 1781, and the composition of wolfram was also determined by the brothers D'Elhuyar a few years later. Metallic tungsten, as obtained by the reduction of the trioxide, is a gray powder having a metallic luster and a specific gravity of 19.129 (Roscoe). The most interesting fact in regard to tungsten is that tungsteniferous minerals, especially wolfram, are very frequent associates of the ores of tin. (See wolfram.) Tungsten has been experimented with in various ways, as in improving the quality of steel by being added to it in small quantity; but nearly containing tungsten has come into general use. (See tungsten steel, under steel.) A new alloy called sideraphite, containing a large percentage of iron, with some nickel, aluminum, and copper, together with 4 per cent. of tungsten, has recently been introduced; this is said to resemble silver, and to be very ductile and malleable and not easily attacked by acids. Another alloy called invargent, consisting chiefly of copper and nickel, is said sometimes to contain a small percentage of tungsten. Tungsten is chemically related to molybdenum and uranium. Certain chemically remarkable compounds of tungsten (tungstates with tungsten dioxide) have been employed as substitutes for bronze-powder.

2. The native tungstate of lime.—Tungsten steel. See steel.

tungstenic (tung-sten'ik), a. [< tungsten + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or procured from tungsten; tungstic.

tungsteniferous (tung-sten-if'e-rus), a. Containing tungsten.

tungstic (tung'stik), a. [< tungsten + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or obtained from tungsten.

—Tungstic acid, an acid obtained by precipitating a solution of tungstic acid in an alkali by the addition of an acid. It is dibasic, having the composition H₂WO₄.—Tungstic ochre. Same as tungstite.

tungstite (tung'stit), n. [< tungst(en) + -ite².] Native oxide of tungsten, occurring in pulverulent form, of a bright-yellow color, usually in connection with wolfram, the tungstate of iron and manganese. Also called tungstic ochre.

tungstous (tūng'stūs), n. Same as tungstic.
tung-tree (tūng'trē), n. [< Chinese Tung + E. tree.] The Chinese varnish- or oil-tree, Alcornoque cordata, extensively grown in China for its oil product. See tung-oil.

Tungusic (tūng-gō'sik), a. A designation applied to a group of Ural-Altaic or Scythian tongues spoken by tribes in the northeast of Asia. The most prominent dialect is the Manchu, spoken by the tribes who conquered China in 1644.

tunhoof (tūn'hōf), n. The ground-ivy, Nepeta Glehoma.

tunic (tū'nik), n. [< ME. -tūnicē (?) (cf. tuniche) (cf. AS. tunica, tunica = OHG. tunihā); < OF. (and F.) tunique = Pr. Sp. Pg. tunica = It. tunica, < L. tunica, a tunic.] 1. In Rom. antiqu., a garment like a shirt or gown worn by either sex, very often an undergarment; hence a general term applied to garments of all periods and materials, which are worn depending from the neck, whether girded at the waist or not, or kept in place by other garments worn outside of them, and whether such garments are long and full or short and scant. Thus, the name is given to the Greek chiton in its various forms, to the early English garment worn under the cloak, and even to the hankie of mail. In the breast of the tunic of the ancient Roman senator a broad vertical stripe of purple (called tatus clavus) was woven; the equites wore two narrow parallel stripes (called angusti clavi) extending from the shoulders to the bottom of the tunic. Hence the terms latiflavus and angustiflavus applied to persons of these orders. See also cut under stola.

Tunic or Chiton of Ionian form (over it is girded the Dynastis or neptris or townskin), from a Greek amphora of the 4th century B. C., found at Perugia. (From "Monumenti dell' Instituto.")

2. A tunic, a Jerkin. Jacket, or sleeveless coat, formerly worn by Princes. Blount, Glossographia (1670).

3. At the present time, a garment generally loose, but gathered or girded at the waist, worn by women, usually an outer garment; a sort of wrap or coat for street wear.

Her Majesty wore a white satin petticoat, over which was a silver flama tunic, trimmed with silver and white blonde lace. First Year of a Silkman's Reign, p. 230.

4. Eccles., a vestment worn over the alb in the Roman Catholic Church and in some Anglican churches by the subdeacon or epistler at the celebration of the mass or holy communion. It is similar in shape and color to the dalmatic, but sometimes smaller and with less ornamentation. The bishop's tunic is worn under the dalmatic, and is shorter than the subdeacon's. See tunic.

5. A military surcoat.—5. In the British army, the ordinary fatigue-coat; applied usually to the coat of a private, but sometimes to that of an officer. [Colloq.]

"Please show me your Victoria Cross." "It's on my tunic, and that's in my quarters in camp." J. H. Ewing, Story of a Short Life, vii.

6. A natural covering; an integument. Specifically: (a) In anat., a covering or investing part; a tunic is at last the eyeball, the stomach, or an artery. See tunica. (b) In bot., one of the layers forming the covering of an asclepiad. See Tunica (with cut), and cut under Asclepiad. (c) In bot., any loose membranous skin not formed from epidermis—the skin of a seed; also, the peridium of certain fungi. Albuginous tunic. Same as albuginea. Arachnoid tunic. Same as arachnoid. 7. Inner tunic, in bot., a membrane, more or less colored, which surrounds the nucleus or hyemium in the genus Persea, situated immediately beneath the pericarpium. Leighton, Brit. Lichens. Ruyschian tunic. Same as chorioepithelium. Talaric tunic. See talaric and tunic cap, under chiton. Vaginal tunic. See vaginal and cap, 1.

tunica (tū'ni-kū), n.; pl. tunicae (-sē). [NL., < L. tunica, tunic; see tunic.] Same as tunic.
Tunica abdominalis, the aponeuroses of the abdominal muscles of some animals, as the horse, forming a strong fascia or sheet for the support of the abdominal viscera.
Tunica adnata, one of the coats of the eyeball, lying between the sclerotic proper and the conjunctiva. It is the expansion of fibrous tissue, or aponeurosis, whereby the muscles of the eyeball are inserted into the sclerotic. Also called adnata, tunica albuginea.—Tunica adventitia. See adventitia.
Tunica albuginea, same as albuginea.

—Tunica arachnoidea. (a) The arachnoid membrane, a thin membrane forming one of the coverings of the brain and spinal cord. (b) One of the layers of the choroid coat of the eye.—Tunica chorioepithelialis. Same as chorioepithelialis.—Tunica conjunctiva. Same as conjunctiva, 1.—Tunica cornea pellucida. Same as cornea, 1.—Tunica granulosa, the granular lining of the cavity of a Graafian follicle.—Tunica intima. Same as intima.—Tunica muscularis mucosae, a thin and at places incomplete layer of smooth muscle-fibers in the mucous membrane of the alimentary canal. Also called simply muscularis mucosae.—Tunica propria, in anat.: (a) The proper coat of some structure, as an artery; the layer which specially constitutes such a structure, as distinguished from other layers which may form a part of it by investing or lining it. The tunica propria of the spleen is a strong elastic connective-tissue coat lying immediately beneath the serous coat; that of the testis is defined under tunica vaginalis testis. (b) Specifically, the membrane lining the bony labyrinth of the ear; the walls of the membranous labyrinth.—Tunica reflexa, the outer wall of the tunica vaginalis testis.—Tunica Ruyschiana. Same as chorioepithelialis.—Tunica vaginalis oculi, a sheathing fascia which surrounds the optic nerve and part of the eyeball, formed of fascia.—Tunica vaginalis testis, the serous investment of the testicle, formed of a pouch or process of the peritoneum, usually a shut sac; it has two walls, the tunica propria, upon the testis itself, and the tunica reflexa, separated from this by the cavity.—Tunica vasculosa Halleri. Same as chorioepithelialis.—Tunica vasculosa testis, the pia mater of the testicle, a vascular layer underlying the tunica albuginea.

tunicary (tū'ni-kā-ri), n.; pl. tunicaries (-riz). [< tunic + -ary.] A tunicate.
Tunicata (tū'ni-kā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of tunicatus, clothed with a tunic; see tunicate.] A class, superclass, or phylum of animals intermediate between and connecting the invertebrates with the true vertebrates, now made a prime division of chordate animals (see Chordata); the ascidians, tunicaries, or sea-squirts. The evidence of vertebrate affinity or character is chiefly in the larval state, when there is a sort of notochord, the urochord (see Urochordata), which in one group persists in the adult (see Appendicularia). The tunicates are so called from the thick, tough, leathery integument or tunic, the name having been given by Lamarck in 1816 to the forms then known, and the class having been placed in his system between the worms and the radiates. The tunicates had before been regarded as polyps or even as sponges; with Cuvier they formed a division (Nuda) of mollusks; afterward and for many years they were considered as molluscs, and associated with or approximated to the brachiopods and polyzoans. The discovery of the urochord by Kowalevsky in 1866 gave the first evidence of their proper position among chordate animals, and consequently of their vertebrate affinity. They were thereupon regarded as the "ancestors" of the vertebrates, of which, however, they appear rather to represent a degenerate or retrograde side-shoot. The developmental history is intricate and perplexing. Alternation of generation has been determined for the whole group, and some members of it occur under two distinct forms. One of the most remarkable peculiarities of Tunicata is the presence in the integument of tunic, a kind of animal cellulose—cellulose having been supposed to be peculiar to plants. Tunicates are very dissimilar to one another in outward appearance, though they conform to a type of structure most parts of which can be clearly homologized with those of vertebrates. An ordinary simple ascidian resembles a leathery bottle fixed at the base, and provided with two openings, through one of which water is withdrawn, and through the other of which it can be expelled with some force when the animal contracts, whence the name sea-squirt; other fanciful names are sea-pear, sea-pouch, sea-puck, and sea-pod. Other tunicates, also fixed, are social, aggregate, or colonial; some are free-swimming, or fixed and free at different stages of their development, and of the free forms some are simple and others are linked in chains. The sals and pyrosomes are phosphorescent. All tunicates are marine; most live on the shore or surface, but some at great depths. Their classification has been almost as changeable as their location in the system. The arrangement of H. Milne Edwards (1826), and long current with little modification has been entirely remodelled. According to the latest views, Tunicata rank as a class divided into three orders: (a) Larvalia, tailed when adult, represented by the family Appendiculariidae (see cut under Appendicularia); (b) Thaliacea, free-swimming, simple or compound, without a tail in the adult, and either eucalyptarian (Doliolidae) or hemimycarian (Salpidae and Ocyropsidae) (see cuts under Doliolidae and Salpidae); and (c) Ascidacea, of which there are three groups or suborders: (1) Salpiformes, resembling salps in being free-swimming, colonial, and luminous, with one family, Pyrosomatidae; (2) Compsoide, fixed, reproducing by gemmation and so forming compound organisms, with seven families, of which Buthididae is the best-known, a member of it having been described in 1756; and (3) Simplex, fixed (exceptionally free) and solitary (rarely social), is imperfectly composite, with four families, Molgulidae, Cynthidae, Ascididae, and Chordulidae. The last named are the social ascidians; the second and third families are each divided into subfamilies ranked as families by some writers, and are also the largest families, represented by the numerous genera and species which come most frequently under observation, and to which the common name ascidian is specially pertinent. (See cuts under Ascididae and gastrulation.) A former broader arrangement, which ignored the peculiarities of the Larvalia, was into two orders, by means of which the salps and the doliolids on the one hand were contrasted with all other tunicates on the other; and each of these orders had a number of different names. Also called Ascidoida.

tunicate (tū'ni-kāt), a. and n. [< L. tunicatus, pp. of tunicare, clothe with a tunic, < tunica, tunic; see tunic.] 1. a. 1. In zool., coated; covered with tunics or integuments; specifically, enveloped in membranous integuments or tunics, as an ascidian; or of pertaining to the Tunicata; tunicated.—2. In entom., covered one by another, like a set of thimbles, as the joints of some antennae.—3. In bot., covered with a tunic or membrane; coated.—Tunicate club or capitulum of an antenna, a club or capitulum formed of tunicate joints, the outer joints being visible only at the end.—Tunicate joints, in entom., joints set one into another like tumblers.

II. n. 1. A tunic. Blount.—2. An ascidian, tunicary, or sea-squirt; any member of the Tunicata.

tunicated (tū'ni-kāt), a. [< tunicate + -ed.] Same as tunicate.—Tunicated bulb, a bulb composed of numerous concentric coats, as an onion.

tunicin (tū'ni-sin), n. [< tunicate + -in.] The peculiar substance, resembling if not identical with vegetable cellulose, found in the integument of the tunicates; animal cellulose. Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 609.

tunicle (tū'ni-kū), n. [*< ME. tunicle, < OF. tunicle, < L. tunica, dim. of tunica, tunic; see tunic.] 1. A tunic; especially, a fine, thin, or delicate tunic; a slight coat or covering.

The humours and tunicles (of the eye) are transparent, to let in colours, and therefore tinged with none themselves. Evelyn, True Religion, I. 31.

2. Eccles., same as tunic, 3. When used in the plural it signifies both the dalmatic and the tunic. Also spelled tunacle.

Where there be many Priests, or Deacons, there so many shalbe ready to help the Priest . . . as shalbe requisite: And shal have upon them likewise the vestures appointed for their ministry—that is to saye, Albes, with tunicles. Book of Common Prayer, Edw. VI., 1549 (ed. Pickering), fol. 101. (The Supper of the Lord).

tuning (tū'ning), n. [Verbal n. of tune, v.] The act, process, or result of adjusting the intonation of a musical instrument. The process varies with the mechanical construction of the instrument. In stringed instruments, like the pianoforte, violin, harp, etc., it consists in adjusting the tension of the strings by means of tuning-pins or -pegs. In wind-instruments, like the flute, clarinet, trumpet, etc., it consists in adjusting the length of the tube by means of some kind of sliding joint or crook, so that the fundamental tone of the tube shall be correct. In a bell it consists in adjusting the thickness of the sound-bow. In the organ it consists in various adjustments of the effective length of the air-column in flue-pipes, or of the vibrating part of the reed in reed-pipes. The intricacy of the process depends chiefly on the number of separate tones whose intonation is fixed, and is most conspicuous in instruments with a keyboard, like the organ and the pianoforte. On these instruments some system of compromise temperament is a necessity, if freedom of modulation is desired. Accordingly, great pains is taken to set the temperament in a single central octave, and all other octaves are then adjusted thereto. Tuning is much facilitated by the phenomenon of beats, especially in the case of the organ. See temperament and beats.—Flat or French flat tuning, one of the methods of tuning a lute; so called because the French pitch was lower than that elsewhere used.—Pythagorean tuning. See Pythagorean.

tuning-cone (tū'ning-kōn), n. A cone of brass, usually hollow, used in tuning metal organ-pipes. When the pitch is to be raised the point of the cone is driven into the top of the pipe so as to increase its flare, and when the pitch is to be lowered the base of the cone is driven over the top of the pipe so as to decrease its flare. Also tuning-horn.

tuning-crook (tū'ning-krook), n. In musical instruments of the brass wind group, a crook or loop of tube which may be inserted to change the fundamental tone of the tube.

tuning-fork (tū'ning-fōrk), n. A steel instrument with two prongs, designed to produce, when struck, a musical tone of some particular pitch. Its invention is ascribed to John Shore, in the middle of the eighteenth century. Tuning forks are particularly useful because their tone is comparatively free from harmonics, and because their pitch is not disturbed by ordinary changes of temperature. They are therefore much employed in acoustical investigation and to furnish convenient standards of pitch. Compare tonometer, and see *pitch*¹.

tuning-hammer (tū'ning-ham'ér), n. A wrench used in tuning the pianoforte, consisting of a long wooden handle with two hollow metal heads made to fit over the tuning-pins: so called because of its general shape.

Tuning-hammer, with adjustable heads.

tuning-horn (tū'ning-hörn), n. Same as tuning-cone.

tuning-key (tū'ning-kē), n. See *key*¹.

tuning-knife (tū'ning-nif), n. Same as reed-knife.

tuning-lever (tū'ning-lev'ér), n. Same as tuning-hammer.

tuning-peg (tū'ning-peg), n. See peg, 1 (c).

tuning-pin (tū'ning-pin), n. Same as tuning-peg.

tuning-slide (tū'ning-slid), n. See slide, 9 (c), and horn, 4 (v).

tuning-wire (tū'ning-wir), n. See *pipe*¹, 2 (b).

Tunisian (tū-nis'i-an), a. and n. [= F. tunisien; as Tunis + -ian.] I. a. Pertaining to Tunis, a regency and protectorate of France, in northern Africa, or to Tunis, its principal city.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Tunis.

tunist (tū'nist), n. A tuner. Sedley Taylor, Science of Music, p. 132. [Rare.]

tunk (tungk), n. [Cf. thump.] A blow; a stroke; a hit. [Prov. Eng. and New Eng.]

Tunker, n. See *Dunker*¹.

tun-moot (tun'mōt), n. [Repr. AS. tūngmōt, < tūn, town, + gemōt, meeting; see *moot*¹.] In early Eng. hist., an assembly, court, or place of meeting of the town or village. See *moot*¹.

There is no ground for believing that the tun-moot was a judicial court. Its work was the ordering of the village life and the village industry; and traces of this still survive in our institutions.

J. R. Green, Making of England, p. 157.

tunnage (tun'āj), n. [*< tun*¹ + -age. Cf. tonnage.] A tax or duty of so much per tun formerly imposed in England upon all imported wines. Sometimes spelled tonnage, and used chiefly in the phrase tunnage (or tonnage) and powdage. See *powdage*¹, 1.

The parliament, which met on the 4th of November under Bedford, signified its gratitude by granting . . . tunnage and powdage for life. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 325.

tunnegar (tun'e-gär), n. A funnel. Hallivell.

tunnel (tun'el), n. [Early mod. E. also tunnel, tunnell; < ME. tunnell, < OF. tunnel, later tunnell, m., a tun, cask, pipe, a tunnel for partridges (F. touneau, a tun, cask, ton), also OF. tounele, F. tounele, f., an arbor, arched vault, a tunnel for partridges, etc., dim. of toune, a tun, cask, pipe; see tun. Hence F. tunnel, a tunnel (def. 7).] 1. The opening of a chimney for the passage of smoke; a thue.

One great chimney, whose long tunnell thence
The smoke forth threw. Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 29.

2. Hence, figuratively, a nostril. [Rare.]

He does take this same filthy roguish tobacco, the finest and cleanest! it would do a man good to see the fume come forth at 's tunnels.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 3.

3. A funnel. See funnel, 1.

His [a vainglorious man's] barrel hath a continual spigot, but no tunnel; and, like an unthrif, he spends more than he gets.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 501.

4. A long pipe-like passage made of wire, into which partridges were decoyed.

Tunnelle, a tunnel or stalking horse for partridges . . . Tunneller, to take Partridges with a Tunnell or Stalking horse.

Catgrave.

5. A tunnel-net. — 6. An arched drain. [Prov. Eng.] — 7. A gallery, passage, or roadway beneath the ground, under the bed of a stream, or through a hill or mountain. Tunnels are used in military operations, in mining, in conveying water, and as passageways for vehicles and railway-trains. They are of various construction, according to the character of the soil or rock through which they pass. In soft silt or sand, as in subways beneath a stream, the interior of the tunnel is lined with brickwork, with, in some instances, a shield of plate-iron outside the bricks. In soil, soft rock, or quicksands, heavy masonry lining is sometimes required. In solid rock, a simple excavation is generally sufficient, as in many of the shorter railroad-tunnels. The section of a tunnel is usually a cylindrical or elliptical arch, with sometimes, in soft soils, an inverted arch below. The earlier modern tunnels were excavated by hand-drilling and blasting; but machine-drilling, by means of compressed air, has been brought to great perfection, and the rate of progression has been increased and the cost of excavation reduced. In the Greathead system of tunneling, the tunnel is made by the use of a cylindrical shield driven forward by hydraulic pressure; the excavation is lined with a cast-iron shell, and the interspace between the shell and the sides of the excavation is lined with grout forced in by air-pressure. The shell is made of segments bolted together. Silt and mud are forced through doors in the face of the shield, and excavated material is taken out through air-locks in the bulkhead of the tunnel. The longest railroad-tunnel is the St. Gotthard, through the Alps (about 9 miles); the longest in the United States is the Hoosac tunnel, in western Massachusetts [4] miles.

The Greathead System of Tunneling as used in the Hudson River Tunnel at New York.

A, longitudinal vertical section; B, transverse section, looking toward bulkhead; C, elevation of shield, looking toward the face; D, detail view of the erector; a, shell; b, shield; c, air bulkhead; d, platform in shield; e, platform at bulkhead; f, air-bucks; g, Morr's erector, whereby the heavy cast-iron segments of the shield are lifted or carried into position; h, support for the erector, resting on the brackets h; i, openings in the face of the shield, through which the silt is caused to flow by pressure (as shown in A); j, jacks, by which the shield is pressed forward into the silt; k, k', railway tracks, the upper for the erector, the lower for transporting excavated material to the elevator l, at the bulkhead; m, car, by which the excavated material passed through the air-locks is received for removal.

8. In mining, any level or drift in a mine open at one end, or which may serve for an adit. See adit, 1.—9. In zoöl., the underground burrow of some animals, when long and tortuous, as of the mole or of the gopher.

Pilot tunnel, a device for directing a tunnel in the prescribed grade, consisting of a flanged tube made up of interchangeable plates, which can be bolted to the shield and forced concentrically into the silt in advance of the face of the heading. From this measurements in any direction can be made to limit the cutting to the proper dimensions and distance from the center.—Tunnel of Corti, in anat., a canal, triangular in section, between the inner and outer sets of the slanting Cortian rods, filled with endolymph. Also Cortian tunnel.

tunnel (tan'el), v.; pret. and pp. tunneled, tun-nelled, ppr. tunneling, tunnelling. [< tunnel, n.] 1. trans. 1. To form, cut, or dig a tunnel through or under.—2. To form like a tunnel; hollow out in length.

Some foreign birds . . . plat and weave the fibrous parts of vegetables together, and curiously tunnel them, and commodiously form them into nests.

Berham, Physico-Theol., iv. 13.

3. To catch in a tunnel-net.

II. intrans. To form, cut, or drive a tunnel. tunnel-disease (tun'el-di-zēz'), n. A form of anemia caused by the parasite Bochmans.

The Italians who died from cholera in digging the Suez Canal, or from tunnel-disease in the St. Gotthard Tunnel.

Nineteenth Century, XXII. 150.

tunneled (tun'eld), a. [< tunnel + -ed.] Provided with a tunnel.—Tunneled sound, in surg., a metallic sound having a central cavity or bore by means of which it can be passed over a more slender instrument previously introduced, called a guide; used when it is desired to effect an entrance through a very narrow passage, as in tight stricture of the urethra. See *sound*¹, n.

tunnel-head (tun'el-hed), n. In metall., the top of a blast- or shaft-furnace.

tunnel-hole (tun'el-höl), n. The throat of a blast-furnace.

tunnel-kiln (tun'el-kil), n. A lime-kiln in which the fuel used is coal, as distinguished from a flame-kiln, in which wood is used. E. H. Knight.

tunnel-net (tun'el-net), n. 1. A fishing-net with a wide mouth and narrow at the opposite end.—2. A part of a pound-net through which fish pass into the bowl. [Lake Michigan.]

tunnel-pit (tun'el-pit), n. Same as tunnel-shaft.

tunnel-shaft (tun'el-shäft), n. A shaft sunk from the top of the ground to meet a tunnel at a point between its ends.

tunnel-vault (tun'el-vält), n. In arch., a barrel- or cradle-vault; a semicircular vault. See cylindrical vaulting, under cylindric.

tunnel-weaver (tun'el-we'vēr), n. Any spider of the group Percitularia; distinguished from orb-weaver.

tunning (tun'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *tun*¹, v.]

1. The act of brewing; also, that which is brewed at one time.

You have some plot now.

I pon a tunning of ale, to stale the yeast.

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, i. 1.

2. The process of being put into a cask or tun.

So skelton-laureat was of Elinour tunning,

But she the subject of the rout and tunning.

B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, v. 3.

tunning-cask (tun'ing-kask), n. A cask in which fermented ale is stored when racked off. See *tun*¹, v., t.

tunning-dish (tun'ing-dish), n. 1+. Same as tun-dish.—2. A wooden dish used in dairies. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

tunny (tun'i), n.; pl. tunnies (-iz). [Formerly also tunnie, tuny, tunny, sometimes thunny; appar. a dim. form of what would reg. be ton*, < OF. ton, thun, F. thun = Fr. thun = It. tonno, < L. thunnus, thynnus, ML. also thunus, prob. also tanuus*, < Gr. thynnus, thone, a tunny, prob. lit. 'darter,' < θύρα, dart along.] A scumbroid fish of the genus Oreogonus, as O. thynnus. The germon, or long-finned tunny, is O. ypsilon or alabonpa. (See cut under albacore.) The true tunny of the Mediterranean and Atlantic waters has been the object of an important fishery, systematically conducted from remote antiquity, as by the Phenicians, to the present day. It is one of the largest food-fishes, growing to a length of 10 feet, and acquiring a weight of one thousand pounds or more. It is a near relative of the bonito and albacore, but is distinguished from the latter by the much shorter pectoral fins; the body is deepest about the middle, whence it tapers rapidly to a slender caudal peduncle; there are eight or nine short separate finlets behind the dorsal and anal fins; the dorsals are two, of which the first rises high in front; the caudal fin is very short, but its upper and under lobes extend high and low. The color is dark-bluish above, and below grayish, irregularly silvery. The tunny is a fish of the high seas, but periodically wanders in large shoals coastwise. The flesh is eaten fresh, or preserved in salt or in oil.

To see the small fish Tunny scape the net.

Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 171).

tun-shell (tun'shel), n. In conch., a tun. See Doliolite, and cut under Doliolum.

tuny (ti'ni), a. [< tune + -y.] Abounding in tunes; characterized by melody, especially as distinguished from harmony. [Colloq.]

Let our modern aesthetes, who sneer at Mozart for being tuny, say what they will.

N. and Q., 7th ser., XI. 30.

tup (tup), n. [See also tip; < ME. tuppe, tupe, a ram. Cf. LAT. tuppen, tuppen, pull by the hair.]

1. A ram; the male of the sheep.

Nowe putte amonge the shepe thaire tuppes white,

Not oonly woolled, but also thair tongue.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 166.

2. In mech. engin., the mass which forms the striking face of a tilt-, drop-, or steam-hammer. It is usually so arranged that it can be removed when worn out or broken. Gun Foundry Board Report, p. 37.

tup (tup), v.; pret. and pp. tupped, ppr. tupping. [< tup, n.] I. trans. 1. To cover or copulate with; used specifically of a ram. Shak. Othello, i. 1. 89.—2. To butt. [Prov. Eng.]—3. To bow to before drinking. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To copulate, as a ram.—2. To butt, as a ram. [Prov. Eng.]

Tupaia (tū-pā'ia), n. [NL. (Sir S. Raffles, 1821), from a native name.] The typical genus of the family Tupaiidae, the squirrel-shrews, containing several species of India, the Malay peninsula, and various Malayan islands. They are pretty little creatures of arboreal habits, with long bushy tails, feeding upon fruits and insects, with the general aspect and manner of squirrels. Some are called banxing and hwa. Also written Tupaia, Tupania.

Tupaia (squirrel-shrew).

Tupaia (tū-pā'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tupaia + -ida.] A family of squirrel-like arboreal and diurnal insectivorous mammals. They have a developed eecum, a comparatively large brain-case, completed orbits, large zygomatic arches, bullate tympanic bones, tibia and tibia separate, the pubic symphysis long, the hind limbs moderately exceeding the fore in length, and thirty-eight teeth. There are at least 2 genera, Tupaia, the leavings, and Ptilocercus, the pentails, inhabiting Asia and Malaysia, with several species. See cuts under Ptilocercus and Tupaia. Also Tupaia.

tupelo (tū'pē-lō), n. [Amer. Ind.] One of several species of Nyssa, most commonly N. sylvestris (N. multiflora), the pepperidge, sour-gum, or black-gum. See black-gum, and cut under Nyssa. The sour tupelo is N. capitata, otherwise called gopher plum and Owchee lime. (See limb.) The large tupelo, cotton, or tupelo-gum, is N. uniflora, a large tree of deep swamps and river-bottoms in the southern United States. Its wood, which is light, soft, and unweakened, is used in turnery, largely for woodenware, for wooden shoes, etc.; that of the root is used for the floats of nets. Sargent. Tupelo tent, a small rod of tupelo which is inserted into the mouth of the womb when it is desired to dilate this passage. The tupelo effects this by increasing in size through absorption of the fluids of the parts.

Tupistra (tū-pis'trī), n. [NL. (Ker, 1814), so called from the shape of the stigma; < Gr. τυπ, to strike, < τυπ, to strike; see type.] A genus of liliaceous plants, of the tribe Aspidistrea. It is characterized by flowers in a dense cylindrical spike with spreading perianth-lobes, and a thick petalate stigma which is deeply lobed or is nearly entire and closes the throat of the flower. There are 3 or 4 species, natives of Burma and of the Himalayas. They are perennial herbs, with long amplex leaves contracted into an erect petiole, growing from a thick rhizome which is either elongated or short and tuberous. The violet or lurid flowers are sessile, crowded between smaller green or scarious bracts upon an erect or recurved scape. They are known as millet flower. T. spatulata, the original species, and T. rotunda, the nodding millet-flower, are sometimes cultivated under glass.

tup-man (tup'man), n. A breeder of or dealer in tups. [Local, Eng.]

tupsee (tup'sē), n. The mango-fish, Polygmus paradosus.

tuque (tūk), n. [Canadian F. form of F. tuque, a cap; see tuque.] A cap worn in Canada. See the quotation.

a, folded to fit the head; b, as knitted.

But the tuque is disappearing, we are sorry to say, and ordinary caps are taking its place. It alone served to mark the habitant. It is something like a long stocking, knit and closed at both ends, and one end being pushed into the other to double it, it is drawn over the head, down the back of the neck, and indeed over the whole face and shoulders if necessary. . . . The sash . . . has been adopted as an ornamental and useful appendage by the citizens; and the snow-shoe clubs have adopted the tuque. The Century, II, 454.

tu quoque (tū kwō'kwō), [L. tu quoque, 'thou too,' i. e. 'you have done the same thing,' or 'you're another'; tu = E. thou; quoque, also, too, perhaps orig. quomque, < quom, quum, as, when, + -que, and.] A retort consisting of a charge or accusation similar to that which has been made by one's antagonist, as in the case of a person charged with bribery who replies that his accuser's hands are not clean of corruption; also used attributively; as, the tu quoque argument is not conclusive.

tur (tūr), n. The urus.

turacin (tū'ra-sin), n. [L. turacin, touacin, + -in.] The red or crimson coloring matter of the feathers of the turakoo. In solution turacin gives two absorption-bands of its spectrum like those of oxyhemoglobin. It contains about six per cent. of copper, which cannot be isolated without destroying the pigment. Turacin is said to wash out more or less during the rainy season, leaving the feathers that were scarlet of a pinkish white.

turacou, n. See turacou.

turacoverdin (tū-ra-ke-vēr'din), n. [L. turacin + F. vert, green (see vert), + -in.] The green coloring matter of the feathers of the turakoo.

Turacus (tū'ra-kus), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), < F. touacou or touacou.] A genus of turakoes, now restricted to species with feathered nostrils, as T. persa, T. corbularis, and about 12 others. It has several synonyms, the most prominent of which is Corythae (Illiger 1814). Also Touacou.

turakoo (tū'ra-kō), n. [Also turako, turaco, touacou, touacou, touacou, etc. (NL. Turacus); an African name.] A bird of the family Muscophagidae and any of the genera Turacus (or Corythae), Schizorhis, etc.; a kind of plantain-eater; sometimes extended to all the birds of this family. The species are numerous, all African, of large size and striking appearance. In the members of the genus Turacus the plumage is mostly bright-green and rich-red, and there is an elegant helmet-like crest which the birds instantly erect when excited or alarmed. They live in the woods in small companies, and their voice is very loud and harsh. One of the best-known is T. corbularis, the white-crested turakoo of South Africa. The Senegal turakoo is T. persa. Another is Schizorhis africanus of West Africa. The gray turakoo is a plainer species, S. concolor, of South Africa. The giant turakoo, Corythae cristata (formerly Turacus giganteus, T. cristatus, Muscophaga cristata, etc.), the blue curassow of Latham, 1823, is a plantain-eater very near the species of Muscophaga proper, with oval exposed nostrils, and a helmet crest; the plumage is chiefly verditer-blue, without crimson; the tail has a broad black subterminal bar; the bill is yellow and scarlet; the eyes are red; the total length is 28 inches. This turakoo inhabits West and Central Africa.

Giant Turakoo (Corythae cristata).

Turanian (tū-rā'ni-an), a. and n. [L. Turan (see Turanian) + -ian.] A word loosely and indefinitely used to designate a family of languages, sometimes applied to the Asiatic languages in general outside of the Indo-European and Semitic families, and so including various discordant and independent families, but sometimes used especially or restrictedly of the Ural-Altaic or Seythian family.

turb, n. [L. turba, a crowd.] A troop; a throng or crowd.

In the second turbe was Maister Coradin.

Rob. of Brunne, I, 188.

All the turbes of denellis floying in the ayer dedde backward. Golden Legend, fol. 24. (Richardson Supp.)

turba (tēr'bā), n. [L., a crowd; see turbid, trouble.] The chorus in medieval passion-plays, representing the Jewish populace.

turban (tēr'ban), n. [Early mod. E. also turband, turban, turbant, turbibant, turbant = MD. turbant = G. Sw. Dan. turban, < OF. turban, turbant, F. turban = Sp. Pg. They wrappe and fold together . . . almost as much linen upon their heads as the Turks do in those linen caps they weare, which are called Turbents.

Coryat, Crudities, I, 90.

2. A modification of the Oriental turban, worn by women in Europe and America during the first half of the nineteenth century.

I was anxious to prevent her from disfiguring her small gentle mousey face with a great Saracen's-head turban.

Mrs. Gaskell, Cranford, ix.

3. A head-dress consisting of a bright-colored handkerchief or square of cotton, worn by negro women in the West Indies and the southern United States.

A black woman in blue cotton gown, red-and-yellow Madras turban, . . . crouched against the wall.

G. W. Cable, An Large, i.

4. During the latter half of the nineteenth century, a hat consisting of a crown either without a brim or with a brim turned up close alongside the crown, worn by women and children.—5. In her, a high rounded cap, supposed to be the official head-dress of the Sultan of Turkey: it is usually represented with plumes attached to its sides, with jeweled clasps, and the like. Also called Turkish crown.—6. In conch, the spire of a univalve shell. See spire, 2, and univalve (with cuts).—Mamamouchi turban, a kind of cap, made in supposed imitation of a Turkish turban: the name is taken from Molière's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

turband (tēr'band), n. Same as turban.

turbaned (tēr'band), a. [L. turban + -ed.] Wearing a turban.

A malignant and a turban'd Turk

Beat a Venetian. Shak., Othello, v, 2, 353.

turban-shell (tēr'ban-shel), n. The test or case of a sea-urchin.

turban-stone (tēr'ban-stōn), n. The typical form of Mohammedan tombstone. It is a low cylindrical pillar with a representation of a turban carved on its top.

turbant, n. An obsolete form of turban.

turban-top (tēr'ban-top), n. A plant of the genus Helvella, a kind of fungus or mushroom.

turbary (tēr'ba-ri), n. [L. turbaria, < L. turba, turb; see turb.] 1. In law, a right of digging turf on another man's land. Blackstone.

Turbarie (Turbaria) is an Interest to dig Turves upon a Common Kitchen, fol. 34.

Cowell's Interpreter.

2. A peat-bog, peat-moor, or peat-swamp; any locality where peat occurs in considerable quantity. See the quotation under peat-moor.

A small bit of turbary land, given up by the parish to the curate for teaching a school.

Baines, Hist. Lancashire, II, 683.

Common of turbary. See common, 4.

Turbellaria (tēr-be-lā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., so called in allusion to the currents caused by their moving cilia; < L. turba, a crowd, + -ella + -ia.] A class of worms, or an order of flatworms, characterized by the ciliation of the body, by means of which they set up little currents or vortices of water: the whirl-worms. The name was given in 1831 by Ehrenberg to worms which had long been known as planarians (see Planaria), and was a mere substitute for or synonym of the earlier designation. It has been used with various extensions and restrictions, and has included the nemertean or so-called rhyndoculous turbellarians (see Nemertea). These are now excluded, and the Turbellaria, as an order of flatworms, are those whose body is ciliated and which have a mouth and with few exceptions an alimentary canal, but no anus. Most of them fall in the two main divisions of rhabdocelous and dendrocelous turbellarians, according to the simple or branched condition of the alimentary canal. They are mainly free-swimming worms, some of microscopic size, others several inches long; some form inhabit fresh and others salt water. See cuts under Dendrocelus, Rhabdocela, and Rhyndocela.

turbellarian (tēr-be-lā'ri-an), a. and n. [L. Turbellaria + -an.] 1. a. Causing little currents or vortices of water by ciliary action, as the more minute members of the class Turbellaria; belonging to this class, as a worm.

II. n. A member of the class Turbellaria.

turbellariform (tēr-be-lā'ri-fōrm), a. [L. Turbellaria, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Like or likened to a turbellarian: as, the turbellariform larva of Hydromyces.

turbeth, n. An obsolete form of turpeth.

turbid (tēr'bid), a. [L. turbidus, disturbed, < turbare, disturb, < turba, mass, throng, crowd, tumult, disturbance. From the same source are E. disturb, trouble, turbin, etc.] 1. Properly, having the lees disturbed; in a more general sense, muddy; foul with extraneous matter; thick; not clear: used of liquids of any kind, or of color.

Though their stream is loaded with sand, and turbid with alluvial waste. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, iii.

2. Confused; disordered; disquieted; disturbed.

I had divers Fits of Melancholy, and such Turbid Intervals that used to attend close Prisoners.

Howell, Letters, ii. 30.

A grim man in a flannel shirt, hatless and with turbid red hair. George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxx.

Turbidæ (tér'bi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1840), irreg. < Turbo + -idæ.] Same as Turbinidæ.

turbidity (tér'bi-d'i-ti), n. [= Sp. turbiedad = It. turbidità; < turbid + -ity.] The state of being turbid; turbidness.

turbidly (tér'bi-d'i), adv. 1. In a turbid or muddy manner.—2. With disorder or roughness; boisterously; vehemently. [Rare.]

A person of small merit is anxiously jealous of imputations on his honour; . . . one of great merit turbidly resents them.

Young, Estimation of Human Life. (Richardson.)

turbidness (tér'bi-d'nes), n. The state or quality of being turbid; turbidity.

turbillion (tér'bi-l'yon), n. [F. tourbillon = Sp. turbillon = Pg. turbião, < L. turbo (turbine), a whirl, whirlwind, hurricane: see turbine.] A whirl; a vortex.

Each of them is a sun, moving on its own axis, in the centre of its own vortex or turbillion.

Steele, Spectator, No. 472.

Turbinacea (tér'bi-nā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL. < Turbo (Turbine) + -acea.] Same as Turbinidæ. Lamarck, 1822.

turbinaceous (tér'bi-nā'shi-us), a. [Erroneous form for turbaceous, < ML. turba, turf, + -aceous.] Of or belonging to turf or peat; turfy; peaty. [Rare.]

The real turbinaceous flavour no sooner reached the nose of the Captain than the beverage was turned down his throat with symptoms of most unequivocal applause.

Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xiii.

turbinal (tér'bi-nal), a. and n. [L. turbo (turbine), a top, + -al.] 1. a. Same as turbinate.

II. n. In zool. and anat.: (a) A turbinate bone; one of the spongy or scroll-like bones of the nasal passages specified as ethmoturbinal, maxilloturbinal, and sphenoturbinal (see the distinctive names). See turbinate, and the phrases there. (b) In the Ophidia, a bone of the skull different from (a). See the quotation, and ent under Pythonidae.

Forming the floor of the front part of the nasal chamber, on each side, is a large concavo-convex bone, which extends from the ethmoidal septum to the maxilla, protects the nasal gland, and is commonly termed a turbinal; though, if it be a membrane-bone, it does not truly correspond with the turbinals of the higher Vertebrata.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 204.

Alinasal turbinal. See alinasal.

turbinate (tér'bi-nāt), a. [= F. turbiné = Sp. Pg. turbinado = It. turbinato, < L. turbinatus, shaped like a top or cone, < turbo (turbine), a top: see turbine.] 1. Shaped like a whipping-top. Specifically—(a) In bot., shaped like a top or a cone inverted; narrow at the base and broad at the apex: as, a turbinate germ, nectary, or pericarp. (b) In conch., spiral, as a univalve shell; whorled from a broad base to an apex.

2. In anat., whorled or scroll-like in shape; turbinal; spongy in texture, or full of cavities; applied to certain bones and parts of bones in the nasal fossæ.—3. Whirling in the manner of a top.—Inferior turbinate bone, a distinct bone attached to the nasal surface of the superior maxillary bone, separating the middle from the inferior nasal fossa; the maxilloturbinal. See cuts under mouth and nasal.—Middle turbinate bone, an indefinite lower section of the lateral mass of the ethmoid.—Superior turbinate bone, an indefinite upper part of the lateral mass of the ethmoid. The superior and middle turbinate bones, taken together, are the ethmoturbinal bone. See cuts under mouth and nasal.—Turbinate crest. See turbinated crest, under crest.—Turbinate process. See process.

turbinate (tér'bi-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. turbinated, pp. turbinating. [L. turbinatus, like a top: see turbinate, a.] I. trans. To fashion like a top. Bailey, 1731.—Turbinated crest. See crest. II. intrans. To revolve like a top; spin; whirl. [Rare.]

turbinate-lentiform (tér'bi-nāt-len'ti-fōrm), a. In bot., between turbinate and lentiform in shape.

turbation (tér'bi-nā'shon), n. [L. turbatio (n), a pointing in the form of a cone, shaped like a top, < turbinatus, cone-shaped: see turbinate.] 1. The act of turbinating, or the state of being turbinate. Bailey, 1727.—2. That which is turbinate; a whorled or scroll-like formation, as a shell.

turbine (tér'bin), n. [F. turbine = Sp. turbina, turbine, = It. turbine, a whirlwind, < L. turbo (turbine), also turben, anything that whirls around, a wheel, a top, a whirlwind, < turbare, disturb, move, < turba, disturbance, uproar, turmoil, also a crowd: see turbid.] A water-wheel driven by the impact or reaction of a flowing stream of water, or by impact and reaction combined.

Turbines are usually horizontally rotating wheels on vertical shafts. They are of various constructions, and may be divided into reaction turbines, or those actuated substantially by the reaction of the water passing through them (their buckets moving in a direction opposite to that of the flow); impulse turbines, or those principally driven by impact against their blades or buckets (the buckets moving with the flow); and combined reaction and impulse wheels, which include the best modern types of turbines. They are also distinguished, by the manner in which they discharge the water, into outward, vertical, or central-discharge wheels. In some types of turbines the discharge is partly vertical and partly central. Such is the case with the wheel shown in the cut, which is constructed and set so that the water enters at the perimeter of the case. By the modern turbine a very high percentage of the potential energy of water is converted into work while passing through the wheel. Compare cut under scroll.—Air-turbine, a wheel of turbinate form driven by wind, or air ejected from a pipe or tube.—Journal-turbine, a turbine having a downward discharge, as distinguished from those in which the discharge is outward, oblique, combined, etc.

turbine-dynamometer (tér'bin-di-nā-mom'e-tér), n. In hydraulic engin., a modification of the Prony brake, which adapts that device for application to vertical shafts or to horizontally revolving wheels on vertical shafts. It is used more especially for testing the power delivered from turbines (whence the name). A spring-scale is used instead of a weight in applying the brake-band. Compare Prony's dynamometer.

Turbinella (tér'bi-nel'ā), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1799), < Turbo (Turbine) + dim. term. -ella.] The typical genus of the family Turbinellidæ. T. pyrum is the famous 'chank' (which see, with cut).

Turbinellidæ (tér'bi-nel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Turbinella + -idæ.] A family of large marine gastropods, whose typical genus is Turbinella; the so-called false volutes, turnip-shells, or pap-boats.

In the strictest sense, the family is limited to tropical species having a pyriform or obconic shell with several transverse columellar plaits, and the radula with one median tricuspid tooth and lateral bicuspid teeth whose inner cusp is larger than the outer cusp. The principal genus, besides the type, is Cynodonta (or Vasum). Also called Vasidae.

turbinelloid (tér'bi-nel'oid), a. Of or relating to the family Turbinellidæ.

turbine-pump (tér'bin-pump), n. A pump in which water is raised by the action of a turbine-wheel driven by exterior power in the opposite direction from that in which it turns when used as a motor. Also called propeller-pump. Compare turbine.

Turbinidæ (tér'bin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Turbo (Turbine) + -idæ.] A family of scutibranchiate gastropods, whose typical genus is Turbo. The stony opercula of some of the species are known as cyathones and sea-beans. Various kinds of turbinids are polished and much used as mantle-ornaments, etc., under the name of verreth-shells. The family has been variously limited, and is now usually restricted to the numerous species of all seas but especially of tropical ones, which have a long cirrus appendage of the foot, a pair of intertentacular lobes, and eleven radular teeth in each cross-row. The shell is generally turbinate or trochiform and highly nacreous, and its aperture is closed with a thick calcareous operculum whose nucleus is centre or eccentric. See cuts under Turbo and Imperator. Also Turbita, Turbinacea.

turbiniform (tér'bi-ni-fōrm), a. [L. turbo (turbine), a wheel, top, + forma, form.] Top-shaped, as a shell; having turbinate whorls or spire; resembling or related to the Turbinidæ; turbinoid.

turbinite (tér'bi-nīt), n. [L. turbo (turbine), a top, + -itē.] A fossil shell of the family Turbinidæ, or some similar shell. Also turbite.

turbinoid (tér'bi-noid), a. [L. turbo (turbine), a top, + Gr. idōs, form.] Top-shaped; turbiniform; spirally coiled, wreathed, or whorled, as the turns of a shell. Specifically applied—(a) To shells, whether of foraminifera, gastropods, or cephalopods, whose whorls rise in a conical or conoidal figure, as compared with shells coiled flat in one plane. (b) To gastropods resembling or related to the Turbinidæ.

turbit, n. An obsolete form of turbot.

turbit (tér'bit), n. [Origin unknown.] A breed of domestic pigeons with white body and colored wings, ruffled breast, very short stout beak, flattened head, and peak-crest or shell-crest or both. There are several color-varieties; some are whole-colored.

turbite (tér'bit), n. [L. turbo, a wheel, top, + -itē.] Same as turbinite.

turbith (tér'bit), n. Same as turpath.

turbiteen (tér'bi-tēn'), n. [L. turbo + -teen as in sakeen, relucteen, etc.] A strain of domestic pigeons of the turbit breed, which occurs in several colors.

Turbo (tér'bō), n. [NL., < L. turbo (turbine), a whirl, wheel, top: see turbine.] 1. The typical genus of the family Turbinidæ, formerly very extensive, now restricted to species with a regularly turbinate shell, rounded aperture, smooth beveled columellar lip, and a calcareous operculum with a central or subcentral nucleus. Some attain considerable size, and when polished show beautiful colors, as green, red, and pearly-white, the last highly iridescent with nacreous luster. Various species, as T. sarmaticus and T. marmoratus, are common mantle-ornaments. See sea-bean, 3, and cut under operculum.

2. [l. c.] A shell of this genus.

turbot (tér'bot), n. [Early mod. E. also turbet, turbitt, turbitt, etc.; < ME. turbote, turbut (= MD. turbot, turbot, turbot, D. turbot): cf. Ir. turbitt = Gael. turbaid = W. turbet (prob. < E.) = Bret. turboden, turboden (prob. < F.): < OF. turbot, a turbot, prob. < L. turbo (turbine), a top (cf. ML. turbo, a turbot; Gr. pin top, a top, also a turbot). The ME. forms turbut, turbutte appar.

simulate a connection with *but*², which is contained in habbut.] 1. One of the larger flat-fishes, Psetta maxima (formerly Rhombus maximus), belonging to the family Pleuronectidæ. With the exception of the halibut, the turbot is the largest flatfish of European waters, attaining a weight of from 30 to 40 pounds. It is white on the lower or blind side; the colored upper side is of variegated dark brownish shades, and the fins are much spotted. It is very highly esteemed as a food-fish. Also called haddock-fish.

Turbine.

a, cylinder; b, lower flange of case; c, gates, which also act as guides to direct the flow upon the buckets, and which are pivoted medially to balance the hydrostatic pressure upon them; d, upper flange, or crown-plate; e, gate-pinion, which gears with the toothed segment f, connected by an arm with the gate-arm hub g; h, h, gate-rods pivoted at their inner ends to g, and at their outer ends to the gates e, f, by which mechanism the turning of the pinion e causes the opening or closing of the gates; i, gate-pinion shaft, either operated independently or controlled by a governor for regulating the flow of water to the buckets; j, sleeve, which is held by the bush k and set-screws on the shaft l, the sleeve holding the gate-hub in position; m, clutch-coupling for connecting with a shaft for transmitting power. A is a vertical section, with two diagrams, showing bridge tree n, which carries the locust or lignum-vite step o, fitted to a concave bearing in the bottom of the shaft l. It also shows the upper and central discharge-buckets p, and the lower and vertical discharge-buckets q.

Wreath-hell (Turbo marmaratus).

Chondonta cornigera.

Turbot (Psetta maxima).

The Greeks and Latins both call it [the lozenge] Rombus, which may be the cause, as I suppose, why they also gave that name to the fish commonly called the Turbot, who beareth lustily that figure.

Pottenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 76.

2. In the United States, one of several large flounders more or less resembling the above, as Bothus maculatus, the sand-flounder or window-pane of the Atlantic coast, more fully called spotted turbot, and Hypopsetta guttata, the diamond flounder of California.—3. The file-fish. [Bermudus.]—4. The trigger-fish.—Bastard turbot. See bustard.

turbulence (tér'bi-lens), n. [F. turbulence = Sp. Pg. turbulencia = It. turbolenza, turbulenzia, < L. turbulencia, trouble, disquiet, < L. turbulentus, turbulent; see turbulent.] The state or character of being turbulent; a disturbed state; tumultuousness; agitation; disorder; commotion; refractoriness; insubordination.

They were necessitated by the turbulence and danger of those times to put the Kingdom by their own authority into a posture of defence. Milton, Eikonoklastes, viii.

=Syn. Tumult, riot, sedition, mutiny, insurrection turbulency (tér'bi-lens), n. [As turbulence (see -cy).] Turbulency. Milton, P. R., iv. 462.

turbulent (tér'bi-lent), a. [F. turbulent = Pr. turbulent, turbulent = Sp. Pg. turbulento = It. turbolento, turbulento, < L. turbulentus, restless, stormy, < turbare, trouble, agitate; see turbid.] 1. Disturbed; agitated; tumultuous; being in violent commotion; as, the turbulent ocean.

It has been a turbulent and stormy night.

Shak., Pericles, iii. 2. 4.

2. Restless; unquiet; refractory; disposed to insubordination and disorder; hence, violent; tumultuous; riotous; disorderly.

It were happy for Government if these turbulent spirits could be singled out from the rest in their first attempts. Stillington, Sermons, I. vii.

3. Producing commotion or agitation; inducing turbulence.

A froward retention of custom is as turbulent a thing as an innovation. Bacon, Innovations (ed. 1887).

=Syn. 2 and 3. Obstreperous, uproarious, brawling; seditious, mutinous, revolutionary.

turbulently (tér'bi-lent-li), adv. In a turbulent manner; tumultuously; with violent agitation; with refractoriness.

Turcism (tér'sizm), n. [ML. Turcus, Turk (see Turk), + -ism.] The religion, manners, character, or customs of the Turks.

Preferring Turcism to Christianity. Bp. Atterbury.

Türk's column. See columns of Türk, under column.

Turco¹ (tür'kō), n. [F. < turc (or It. Turco), Turk; see Turk.] One of a body of light infantry raised among the natives of Algeria for service in the French army, and properly called Algerian tirailleurs. Also Turko.

turco² (tér'kō), n. A small Chilean bird, Myiarchus magapollus.

turcois, n. Same as turquoise.

Turcoman, n. See Turkoman.

Turcophile (tér'kō-fil), n. [ML. Turcus, Turk, + Gr. φίλος, love.] One who favors the Ottoman Turks, or their principles or policy. The Times (London), June 16, 1876.

Turcophilism (tér'kō-fil-izm), n. [ML. Turcophile + -ism.] The course or principles of a Turcophile. Athenaeum, Feb. 10, 1887.

Turcophobist (tér'kō-fō-bist), n. [ML. Turcus, Turk, + Gr. φόβος, fear.] One who earnestly opposes the Ottoman Turks or their policy. J. Baker, Turkey, p. iv.

turcopolier (tér'kō-po-lier), n. [OF. (AF.) turcopoler, also turcopuler, tricoplier, turcupler, also turcopole, turcupole, commander of light cavalry called turcoples, turcoples, < ML. turcopoli, < ML. turcopoli, light-armed soldiers, so called < Τύπος, τύπος, Turk, + πολις, child (Gr. πόλις, colt).] An officer of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem of the tongue of England.

The Turcopolier of the Knights Hospitallers was always an Englishman; he was the commander of the light infantry of the order.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 265.

turd (tér'd), n. [< ME. tord, toord, < AS. tord = MD. tord, a lump of excrement. Hence dim. troddle, < ME. tyrdel, < AS. tyrdel, dim. of tord.] A ball or lump of excrement; dung. [Low.]

Turdidae (tér'di-tē), n. pl. [NL. < Turdus + -idae.] A large and nearly cosmopolitan family of dentirostral oscine passerine birds, named from the genus Turdus; the thrushes and thrush-like birds, sometimes called Merulidae. The Turdidae form the leading group of turbid, turdiform, or cichlomorph birds, respecting neither the definition nor the subdivision of which are any authors agreed.

The Sylviidae, which form an extensive group, are alternately included in and excluded from it; and the same is true of five or six other nominal families of less extent, as Saxicolidae, Cinclidae, Pycnonotidae, Mimidae, Tragopodidae, some of the Tinidae, etc. The most typical Turdidae are characterized by the combination of notched gryaniform bill, hooked tarsi, ten primaries of which the first is short or spurious, and the spotted coloration of the young birds. Such Turdidae constitute a subfamily, Turdinae, to which the family name is sometimes restricted. True Turdidae abound in the Palearctic, Ethiopian, Searctic, and Neotropical regions. Some of them are among the most familiar of birds, as the fieldfare and blackbird of Great Britain, and the robin and wood-thrush of the United States. See Turdus and thrush.

turdiform (tér'di-fōrm), a. [< NL. turdiformis, < L. turdus, a thrush, + forma, form.] Thrush-like; resembling or related to a thrush; belonging to the Turdiformes; turdoid; cichlomorphie.

Turdiformes (tér'di-fōr'méz), n. pl. [NL. see turdiform.] The thrushes and thrush-like birds; the turbid Passeres; the Cichlomorphie.

Turdinæ (tér'di-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Turdus + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Turdidae, represented by the genus Turdus and its near allies, and equivalent to the family Turdidae in a restricted sense; the true thrushes, often called Merulinae. See Turdidae, Turdus, and thrush.

turdine (tér'din), a. [< Turdus + -inæ.] Thrush-like in a strict sense; of or belonging to the Turdinæ.

turdoid (tér'doid), a. [< L. turdus, a thrush, + Gr. είδος, form.] Thrush-like in a broad sense; turdiform or cichlomorphie; especially used in the phrase turdoid Passeres, applied by Wallace to such birds in distinction from sturnoid, tamagroid, and formicarioid Passeres.

Turdulus (tér'dj-us), n. [NL. (Hodgson, 1844), dim. of Turdus, q. v.] A genus of Oriental ground-thrushes, containing such as the Indian T. wardi, now usually referred to Geocichla.

Turdus (tér'dus), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, taken as of 1758), < L. turdus, a thrush, fieldfare; see thrush.] A genus of thrushes. It formerly included any of the Turdidae and various other birds supposed to be thrush-like; later it was variously restricted, and it is now usually confined to species like the European mistle-thrush (T. viscivorus), song-thrush (T. muscivorus), fieldfare (T. pilaris), and redwing (T. ilicinus). In these the sexes are similar, the throat is not streaked, and the general color is not black. (See cuts under fieldfare, mistle-thrush, and thrush.) In the narrowest sense, the genus is coincident with the family in geographical range, being represented in Europe, Asia, Africa, and America. The blackish or dark thrushes, such as the common blackbird or onzel of Europe, T. merula, and the ring-onzel, T. toquatus, represent an extensive group either kept in Turdus proper or separated under the name of Merula. (See cuts under onzel and blackbird.) The common robin or migratory thrush of North America represents a group indifferently called Flaesticus (as a subgenus of Turdus) or merged in Merula. (See cut under robin.) The song-thrushes of North America represent a section of Turdus named Hylæochla, as the wood-thrush, T. (H.) mustelinus, the hermit-thrush, T. (H.) pallasi (see cut under hermit-thrush), the tawny or Wilson's thrush, or very T. (H.) fuscescens (see cut under veery); the olive-backed or swainson's thrush, T. (H.) swainsoni; the gray-checked or Alice's thrush, T. (H.) alice; all of which are common woodland songsters of the United States. The varied thrush, or Oregon robin (see cut under thrush), formerly T. varius, represents a section Hesperochla, or is taken out of the genus and called Geocichla nevadæ. See Turdidae and thrush.

Turdus Solitarius (tér'dus sol-i-tā-ri-us), [NL. 'solitary thrush': L. turdus, thrush; solitarius, solitary.] A constellation introduced by Le Monnier in 1776, on the tail of Hydra, and encroaching on the southern scale of Libra. It is no longer used.

tureen (tj-rén'), n. [A false form of terreen, more prop. terrine, < F. terrine, an earthen vessel; see terrine.] The spelling tureen seems to have arisen in cook-books. There is a story that Marshal Turenne once used his helmet as a soup-dish, and thus gave a name to the dish. This is a mere fiction.] A deep dish with a cover, for holding liquids at table; especially, such a vessel, holding a gallon or more, intended for soup.

turf¹ (tér'f), n. [pl. turfs (tér'fs), obsolete turres (tér'vz).] [< ME. turf, torf (pl. turres, turres), < AS. turf (dat. and pl. turf) = OFries. turf = MD. turf, turf, D. turf = MLG. I.G. turf = OHG. turba, turf, G. dial. turbe (G. turf, < LG.) = Lecl. turfa, f., turf, n. = Sw. turf = Dan. tørr (cf. F. tourbe, Sp. Pg. turba, It. turba, ML. turba, < Teut.), turf; cf. Skt. darbha, a kind of grass.] 1. The surface or sward of grass-land, consisting of earth or mold filled with the roots of grass and other small plants, so as to adhere and form a kind of mat; earth covered with grass.

The shepherd that complain'd of love,

Who you saw sitting by me on the turf.

Shak., As you like it, iii. 4. 52.

2. A piece of such earth or mold dug or torn from the ground; a sod.

In a litle herbe that I have,
That benched was on turres fresche ygrave,
I bad men sholde me my conche make.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 204.

Those that are first cut up are called Turfes, . . . and such as are taken downward are called Peates.
Norden, Surveyor's Dialogue (1608), in Harrison's England (New Shak. Soc.), II. 183.

3. In Ireland, same as peat. See peat.

In this rude hostel, however, the landlord . . . offered a seat at the turf-fire. Thackeray, Irish Sketch-Book, xix.

A typical red bog gives four kinds of peat: near the surface is the clearing of more or less living organic matter, from 2 to 6 feet in thickness; under this white turf, then brown turf, and lowest of all, black or stone turf.

Kinahan, Geol. of Ireland, p. 269.

The turf, the race-course; hence, the occupation or profession of racing horses.

We justly boast

At least superior jockeyship, and claim

The honors of the turf as all our own!

Cowper, Task, ii. 277.

All men are equal on the turf or under it.

Lord George Bentinck. (Imp. Diet.)

To stool turfs. See stool.—Turf web-worm. Same as sod-worm.

turf¹ (tér'f), v. l. [*< turf*¹, n.] To cover with turf or sod; as, to turf a bank or border. Bacon, Gardens (ed. 1887).

turf² (tér'f), n. [< ME. tyrf, tyrfre; prob. < torven, turn; see torre, topsy-turvy.] The turn of a cap, hood, or sleeve.

Tyrf of a cappe or suche lyke. Rebrus.

Palsgrave, p. 281

turf-ant (tér'f-ant), n. A small yellowish ant of Europe, Lasius flavus, which makes its hills on turf.

turf-bound (tér'f-bound), a. Covered and held together by a close and unyielding surface of turf.

These fields and mountains are so turf-bound that no particle of soil is carried away by the water.

The Century, XXVII. 419.

turf-charcoal (tér'f-ehär'köl), n. Same as peat-charcoal.

turf-clad (tér'f-klad), a. Covered with turf. F. Knorr.

turf-cutter (tér'f-kut'er), n. A paring-plow. E. H. Knight.

turf-drain (tér'f-drän), n. A drain covered with turf. E. H. Knight.

turfen (tér'f-n), a. [*< turf*¹ + -en.] Made of turf; covered with turf; as, turfen steps. Disraeli, Coningsby, vii. 5.

turfet (tér'f-er), n. [< ME. turfet, turfare; < *turf*¹ + -er.] A clod-breaker; a plowman.

Turfet. Glebarius.

Prompt. Parc., p. 507.

turfery, n. Same as turbury. Skinner.

turf-gravet (tér'f-grä'ver), n. A plowman. Halliwel.

turfiness (tér'f-nes), n. The state or quality of being turf.

turfing-iron (tér'fing-i'ern), n. An implement for paring off turf.

turfing-spade (tér'fing-späd), n. An instrument for under-cutting turf when marked out by the plow.

turfite (tér'f-it), n. [*< turf*¹ + -ite.] A frequenter of the turf; one devoted to horse-racing. [Colloq.]

The very flashy turfite at Hyde Park Corner, and the less flashy, but quite as turf, gentleman who operates at the other corner of Piccadilly. Thackeray.

turf-knife (tér'f-nif), n. An implement for tracing out the sides of drains, trenches, etc. It has a similar-like blade, with a tread for the foot and a bent handle.

turfman (tér'f-man), n.; pl. turfmen (-men). One who is devoted to horse-racing.

turf-moss (tér'f-mös), n. A tract of turf, mossy, or boggy land.

turf-plow (tér'f-plou), n. A plow adapted to remove the turf from the surface of the ground preparatory to deep plowing, or for destroying grubs, etc.

turf-spade (tér'f-späd), n. 1. A spade used for cutting and digging turf or peat, longer and narrower than the common spade.—2. A spade for cutting turf for sodding lawns, etc. See cut d under spade.

turf-worm (tér'f-wèrm), n. Same as sod-worm. See cut under Crambidae.

turfy (tér'fi), a. [*< turf*¹ + -y.] 1. Abounding or covered with turf; covered with short grass; also, having the qualities, nature, or appearance of turf.

Thy turfy mountains, where live nibbling sheep.

Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 62.

Can you see many long weeds and nettles among the graves, or do they look turfy and flowery?

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xxiii.

A turfy slope surrounded with groves.

E. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 390.

2. Of or connected with the turf or peat-ground; characteristic of the turf or of horse-racing; sporting.

Mr. Bailey asked it again, because—accompanied with a straddling action of the white cords, a bend of the knees, and a striking forth of the top-boots—it was an easy, horse-fleshy, turfy sort of thing to do.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xxvi.

turgent (têr'jënt), a. [< ME. turgent, < L. turgere(t)-s, ppr. of turgere, swell. Cf. turgid.] 1. Swelling; tumid; rising into a tumor; puffy.

The turgent trunkle let scuffle.

That humor effluent out of it lie.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 125.

2*f.* Tumid; turgid; inflated; pompous; bombastic.

All honour, offices, applause, grand titles, and turgent epithets are put upon him. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 212.

turgesce (têr-jes'), v. i.; pret. and pp. turgesced, ppr. turgescing. [< L. turgescere, inceptive of turgere, swell; see turgent.] To become turgid; swell; become inflated. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

turgescence (têr-jes'ens), n. [= F. turgescence = Sp. Pg. turgencia = It. turgenza; as turgescen(t) + -ce.] 1. The act of swelling, or the state of being swelled.—2. In med., the swelling or enlargement of any part, usually from congestion or the extravasation of serum or blood.—3. Pompousness; inflation; bombast.

turgescency (têr-jes'ens-i), n. [As turgescence (see -cy).] Same as turgescence.

turgescent (têr-jes'ent), a. [= F. turgescens, < L. turgescens(t)-s, ppr. of turgescere, begin to swell; see turgescere.] Growing turgid; swelling. Bailey, 1727.

turgescible (têr-jes'ib-l), a. [< turgescere + -ible.] Capable of swelling or becoming turgescence.

Similar but less extensive turgescible tissue exists in other portions of the nasal mucous membrane.

Medical News, XLIX, 214.

turgid (têr'jid), a. [< F. turgide = Pg. It. turgido, < L. turgidus, swollen, < turgere, swell out; see turgent.] 1. Swollen; bloated; tumid; distended beyond its natural or usual state by some internal agent or expansive force; often applied to an enlarged part of the body.

These lurking particles [of air] so expanding themselves must necessarily plump out the sides of the bladder, and so keep them turgid. Boyle, Works, I, 114.

2. Tumid; pompous; inflated; bombastic; as, a turgid style.

It is much easier to write in a turgid strain than with . . . delicate simplicity. Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 3.

Turgid palpi, palpi the last joint of which appears bladders, as in the male crickets.—Syn. 1. Swollen, puffed up.—2. Stuffed, grandiloquent. See turgidness.

turgidity (têr-jid'i-ti), n. [< turgid + -ity.] 1. The state of being turgid or swollen; turgidness; tumidity.

The forerunners of an apoplexy are . . . vertigos, weakness, wateriness, and turgidity of the eyes.

Arbuthnot, On Diet, iii.

2. Bombast; turgidness; pompousness.

We call him [Johnson] affected for his turgidity.

Landor, Imag. Conv., Archdeacon Hare and Walter Landor.

turgidly (têr-jid'li), adv. In a turgid manner; with swelling or empty pomp; pompously.

turgidness (têr-jid'nes), n. 1. The state of being turgid; a swelling or swelled state of a thing; distention beyond the natural state by some internal force or agent, as of a limb.—2. Pompousness; inflated manner of writing or speaking; bombast; as, the turgidness of language or style.—Syn. 2. Puñtation, Rant, etc. See bombast.

turgidous (têr-jid'us), a. [< L. turgidus, swollen; see turgid.] Turgid.

Puffie, inflate, turgidous, and ventosity are come up.

E. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

turgite (têr'jit), n. [< Turgisk, a copper-mine in the Ural, + -ite.] A hydrous oxid of iron, occurring in mammillary or stalactitic masses much resembling limonite, from which, however, it is easily distinguished by its red streak. Also called hydrochalcite.

turgometer (têr-gom'e-têr), n. [Breg. < L. turgere, swell, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] That which measures or indicates the amount or degree of turgidity. See the quotation. [Rare.]

The more the cells [of Drosera dichotoma] lose their turgidity, the more does the plastoid tend to assume a spherical form. Its spindle-shaped elongated form may, however, be restored by again bringing about turgidity, e. g., by injection of water into the tissue. Thus the plastoid may be regarded as a turgometer, since it indicates the state of turgidity of the cell.

W. Gardiner, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXIX, 232.

turgor (têr'gor), n. [< L. turgor, a swelling, < L. turgere, swell; see turgent.] 1. In physiol., the normal fullness of the capillaries and smaller blood-vessels, upon which is supposed to depend in part the resilience of the tissues; usually qualified by the epithet vital. [Rare.]

With the cessation of the circulation and vital turgor, the skin becomes ashy pale, and the tissues lose their elasticity.

Quain, Med. Dict., p. 328.

2. In bot. See the quotation.

The state of turgor, as it has long been called by botanical physiologists, by virtue of which the framework of the protoplasm of the plant retains its content with a tenacity to which I have already referred, is the analogue of the state of polarization of Bernstein. Nature, XL, 524.

turkey (têr'ki), n. [Formerly also turky, turkie; short for Turkey-cock or Turkey-hen, 'cock' or 'hen of Turkey,' Turkey here meaning 'Tatary' or vaguely 'Asia,' whence the bird was at first supposed to come; < F. Turque, Turkey, < Turc, Turk; see Turk. The bird was also supposed to come from India, being also called cock of India, F. poule d'Inde, now dinde, 'hen of India,' Sp. gallina de India, 'hen of India,' It. gallo or gallina d'India, 'cock' or 'hen of India,' G. Indische hen or hen (Minsheu). 'Indian hen,' also Calcutischer hahn or heun (cf. D. kalkoon) 'cock' or 'hen of Calicut.' It was also referred to Africa, being called Guinea-hen (G. Guinea-hen, etc.), or hen of Guinea (hen of Guinea, etc.), and confused with the guinea-hen as now so known; Sp. gallina Morisca, 'Moorish hen,' etc. (So maize, or Indian corn, was supposed to come from 'Turkey' or Asia, and was called Turkey-wheat.) The Hind. name is perû, perhaps referring to its American ('Peruvian') origin. The Ar. name in Egypt is dik râmî, 'fowl of Turkey.' I. An American gallinaceous bird of the genus Meleagris: any species of Meleagris. See the technical names.

Turkeys are of two totally distinct species; one of these has two varieties, both widely known and with a long intricate history; the other species is practically unknown, except in ornithology. (a) The turkey now living wild in Mexico, and everywhere domesticated, became known to Europeans almost immediately upon the discovery of Mexico by the Spaniards in 1518. It was described by Oviedo, in or about 1527, as already domesticated among Christians and elsewhere than in New Spain (Mexico); it was called pavo, and the strutting of the gobbler with stiffly erect spread tail, like that of the peacock, was noted. It is traditional, and not incredible though unproved, that the turkey reached England in 1524, and certain that it was established in domestication in Europe by 1530. There is English documentary evidence of the turkey in 1541; the bird was first figured, both by Belon and by Gesner, in 1555; and by 1575 it had already taken up its since established connection with Christmas festivities. It is quite probable, but not in evidence, that there were other and very early (perhaps the earliest) European importations of turkeys from New England; if so, the domestic bird would be a composite of the two feral varieties noted below. From Gesner on, for about 200 years, the usual technical name of the turkey was gallapavo (with variants gallapavus and gallapara, sometimes paragallus, and qualified as gallapavo silvestris, gallapavo cristatus, simulating a modern binomial). But meanwhile, by some confusion with the African guinea hen, the exact date and occasion of which are open to conjecture, the turkey as domesticated in Europe was called meleagris (so Charleton, "Excercitationes," 1677, and on to Linnaeus, "Fauna suecica," 1746). These two synonyms thus ran parallel for many years, till in the Linnaean "Systema Naturæ," 1758, they were united in the onym Meleagris gallapavo. There had not then been, nor was there for some time afterward, any suspicion that two different species, or well-marked feral races, of the turkey existed in America (both covered by the term M. gallapavo). One of these, the ordinary wild turkey of the United States, was first technically specified by William Bartram, in 1791, as M. americana, and was soon after twice renamed by Vieillot, as M. silvestris and M. fero. The other of these, native in Mexico, and also extending into adjoining regions of the United States, was by John Gould, in 1856, specified as M. mexicana. This renaming accentuated the actual distinctions between the two kinds of turkeys, and also the fact, not before made prominent, that Gould's Mexican species was more like the ordinary domestic bird than like the feral bird of the United States. Hence M. mexicana is rightly taken to be a mere synonym of M. gallapavo, which latter name, as based mainly or wholly upon domesticated descendants of the Mexican form, is properly restricted to these and to their feral stock; and the distinctive origin of the United States wild turkey becomes M. americana (after Bartram), or M. sylvestris (after Vieillot, with those who decline to recognize Bartram's names on the ground that his nomenclature was not systematically binomial). The distinctions, though not trenchant, are obvious. (1) The northern wild turkey inhabits or has inhabited the eastern half of the United States, north into Canada, where it still occurs, northwest to some parts of the Missouri region, and southwest to Texas; it has been for many years extirpated from New England, where it formerly abounded. It lingers in the Middle States, still occurs in the immediate vicinity of Washington, and is common in the south and west. The head and upper part of the neck are naked, bristly, and carunculate, with an erect fleshy process on the former and a dewlap on the latter; a long bunch of coarse hairy feathers hangs from the breast; the tarsi are naked, scutellate before and behind, and spurred in the cock; the tail is broad and rounded, of fourteen to eighteen feathers, capable of erection into a circular disk (indicating the relationship of the turkey to the peafowl, and so of the Meleagride to the Phasianide). The plumage is compact and lustrous, and that of the body is almost entirely of blackish-bronzed tints, not markedly whitening on the rump, upper tail-coverts, and ends of the tail feathers. The cock or gobbler is 3 feet or more in total length, and may acquire a weight of 30 pounds, though the average is much less; the hen is considerably smaller and lighter. The wild turkey is confined to woodland. It continues abundant enough to retain economic importance, and its chase is a distinct branch of field sport; it is usually pursued with the shotgun, like other game-birds, or stalked with the rifle, like larger game; it may be decoyed by imitating its gobbling (see turkey-call), and where abundant may be trapped (see turkey-pen). The female nests on the ground, and lays a numerous clutch of eggs of a buff color profusely speckled with dark brown. The eggs have often been hatched under the domestic turkey, but the difficulty of immediately domesticating this feral stock is great. (2) The Mexican turkey, found wild in Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, as well as southward, is mainly distinguished by the chestnut-brown upper tail-coverts with paler or whitish tips, and the similar light tips of the tail-feathers. This marking is usually distinctive, as when dark-colored individuals of the tame turkey are marketed unplucked for wild turkeys. Under domestication, now protracted for more than 300 years, this turkey has tended to enormous development of the caruncles and dewlap, occasionally sports a topknot of feathers, and runs into several color-strains which may be perpetuated by methodical selection. One of these, known in England as the Norfolk, tends to melanism, being chiefly of a lustrous blackish color; but the usual variation is in the opposite direction, resulting in the variegated plumage of the breed known in England as the Cambridgeshire, and in the buff, the pieb, and even the white color strain. (See also bronze turkey, under bronze.)

Wild Turkey of the United States, Me. ag. americana, male.

Hares, Partridges, Turkies, or Egges, fat or lean, young or old, they devour all they can catch in their power.

Capt. John Smith, Works, i. 134.

The Turkey (in New England) is a fowl, of a black colour, yet is his flesh white; he is much bigger than our English Turkey; he hath long Leggs wherewith he can run as fast as a Dog, and can fly as fast as a Goose.

(b) The second species of Meleagris is M. ocellata, the ocellated turkey of Honduras and some other parts of Central America. This is much smaller and more beautiful than the other, the plumage is intensely lustrous, and in part eyed with iridescent ocelli, recalling those of the peacock; the bare head is deep blue, studded with caruncles of an orange color, and no dewlap is developed.

2. With qualifying term, one of several different Australian birds which resemble or suggest the turkey. See phrases below.—Bronze turkey. See bronze.—Cambridgeshire turkey. See def. 1 (a) (2). [Eng.]—Colorado turkey. See Pantodus.—Crested turkey. a variety of the domestic turkey having a topknot of feathers. This has long been known; it was figured by Albin in 1735, and was the gallapara cristatus of various authors.—Honduras turkey. the ocellated turkey. Mexican turkey. See def. 1 (a). Native turkey. the Australian bustard, Otus (Choriotis) australis. [Anglo-Australian.]—New England wild turkey. the feral turkey of the region named. This was early noted as differing from the domestic bird in its dark color and supposed greater size, and was the gallapara sylvestris of various writers, as Ray, 1713. Its size was usually exaggerated, even up to a weight of 60 pounds (Brisson, 1760). See def. 1 (a) (1), and quotation from Clarke.—Norfolk turkey. See def. 1 (a) (2). [Eng.]—Ocellated turkey. See def. 1 (b). Wild turkey. See def. 1 (a). (See also brush turkey, water-turkey.)

turkey-blossom (tér'ki-blos-um), n. See Tri-bulus.

turkey-buzzard (tér'ki-buz'járd), n. An American vulture of the family Cathartidae, the Cathartes aura, common and wide-spread through the greater part of North and South America; generally so called in the United States in distinction from the black vulture, or carrion-crow, of that country, Catharista atrata; more fully called red-headed turkey-buzzard. This well-known and very useful bird is abundant in most of the States, extends northward to Canada, and in the Southern States is an efficient scavenger. It is from 27 to 30 inches long, and about 60 inches in extent, of a blackish-brown color, blacker on the wings and tail, and grayer on the wing-coverts; the whole head is bare of feathers, and of a reddish color ranging from livid crimson to pale carmine in the adults; the beak is white; the feet are flesh-colored, and the eyes brown. The naked skin of the head is wrinkled and sparsely bristled; the feathers begin in a circle around the upper part of the neck, and do not run up in a point on the hindhead as in the black vulture. Though ill-favored and bad-smelling when in hand, on the wing the turkey-buzzard is one of the most graceful of birds, soaring and sailing with a strong and buoyant flight on motionless pinions, and affording one of the best examples of this kind of flight. It nests on the ground or near it in hollow stumps and logs, and lays usually two eggs, white or creamy, boldly spotted and blotched with shades of rich brown and neutral tints. The young hatch clothed with whitish down. This vulture has the trick of "playing possum" when captured. The question whether it finds its food by scent or sight, or both, is still discussed. See cut under Cathartes.

turkey-call (tér'ki-kál), n. An instrument producing a sound which resembles the cry of the female turkey, used as a decoy.

Turkey carpet. See carpet.

turkey-cock (tér'ki-kók), n. [Orig. Turkey-cock or Turkey cock (Turkie-cock, etc.), < Turkey, the country so called (see turkey), + cock.] The bird now called turkey (including the female); properly, the male of the turkey, called the gobbler; hence, a person of great personal vanity and foolish pride; so called in allusion to the strutting of the bird.

Puppet-like thou dost advance thy crest,
And swell in big looks like some turkie-cocke,
Ready to burst with pride.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 37.

Here he comes, swelling like a turkey-cock.

turkey-corn (tér'ki-körn), n. Same as squirrel-corn.

Turkey corn. See maize, 1.

turkey-fat ore (tér'ki-fat ör), n. A bright orange-yellow variety of zinc carbonate (smithsonite), colored by cadmium sulphid. It occurs in mammillary forms in the zinc region of southwestern Missouri. [Local.]

turkey-feather laver (tér'ki-fetú'ér lá'vèr), n. A plant: same as peacock's-tail.

turkey-gnat (tér'ki-nat), n. A small black fly, Simulium meridionale, which attacks poultry in the southern and western United States, particularly in the Mississippi valley. Compare cut under Simulium.

turkey-gobbler (tér'ki-gób'ler), n. The turkey-cock. See gobbler, 2.

turkey-grass (tér'ki-grás), n. The cleavers or goose-grass, Galeum aparine. [Local, Eng.]

Turkey gum. See gum arabic, under gum, 2.

turkey-hen (tér'ki-hen), n. [Orig. Turkey-hen or Turkey hen: see turkey-cock and turkey.] The hen or female of the turkey.

Turkey-gnat (Simulium meridionale), about ten times natural size.

Turkey-hone (tér'ki-hón), n. Same as Turkey-stone, 2.

turkey-leather (tér'ki-lethú'ér), n. A leather prepared by oil-tawing without first removing the hair side, the flesh side being blackened in the usual way: used for women's boots and shoes.

turkey-louse (tér'ki-lous), n. Goniodes styliifer, a bird-louse or mallophagous insect of the family Phloptoridae, which infests the domestic turkey, having the sides of the abdomen fringed with long hairs.

Turkey myrrh. See myrrh.

Turkey oak. See oak.

turkey-pea (tur'ki-pé), n. 1. Same as squirrel-corn. Also wild-turkey pea.—2. The hoary pea, Tephrosia virginiana. See Tephrosia. [Southern U. S.]

turkey-pen (tér'ki-pen), n. A pen contrived for trapping turkeys in parts of the United States where they were abundant. It was simply constructed of rails forming four sides and a top, with a low entrance at one place to admit the birds, which were lured by sprinkling corn to some distance from the opening, as well as inside the inclosure. There was no special contrivance to prevent exit, as the efficiency of the trap depended on the fact that the turkeys, on finding themselves shut in, would carry their heads too high to notice the place through which they had crept to pick up the corn.

turkey-poult (tér'ki-pölt), n. The pullet or young of the turkey.

Turkey red. 1. See red, 1.—2. The cotton cloth dyed of this color, formerly brought from the East, but now made in western Europe and in America.—Mock Turkey red. See barwood.—Turkey red oil. See red.

Turkey-slate (tér'ki-slát), n. Same as Turkey-stone, 2.

Turkey-stone (tér'ki-stón), n. [Formerly also turky-stone; < Turkey (see turkey) + stone.] 1†. A turquoise.

She shows me her ring of a Turky-stone, set with little sparks of diamonds. Pepys, Diary, Feb. 18, 1667-68.

2. A very fine-grained silicious rock, commonly of a yellowish or bluish color. It is used with oil for sharpening small cutting-instruments. It is commonly called Turkey oil-stone, as it comes from the interior of Asia Minor. All the so-called bones and oil-stones are almost entirely made up of very fine particles of silica, and the quality of the article varies with the fineness and sharpness of the grain and the compactness of the stone. Some varieties of bone and oil-stone are highly valued for putting a fine edge on delicate cutting-instruments, and bring very high prices.

turkey-vulture (tér'ki-vul'tür), n. The turkey-buzzard; more fully called red-headed turkey-vulture.

Turkey wheat. See wheat.

Turkic (tér'kik), n. Same as Turkish. Anthropol. Jour., XIX. 30. [Rare.]

turkies, n. See turquoise.

turkis†, v. t. [Also torless; < OF. torquiss, torquer, turn: see turken.] To turn; alter.

turlough (tér'loch), n. [< Ir. turlach, a dry lake, < tur, bare, dry, + loch, lake; see lough.] In Ireland, a temporary pond or lake in certain limestone districts.

Some [sluggas] are abrupt deep holes, others open into shallow hollows; and when the water during floods rises in the latter, it overflows the adjoining lands, forming the turloughs, which are usually taken in winter and calows in summer.
Kinahan, Geol. of Ireland, p. 325.

Turlupin (tér'lū-pin), n. [OF., appar. a particular use, in contempt, of turlupin, "a grub, mushrome, start-up, new-nothing man of no value" (Cotgrave, ed. 1611); origin unknown.] In ceches, hist., a name given to the members of a French sect of about the fourteenth century, which held views very similar to those of the Brethren of the Free Spirit.

The Turlupins were first known by the names Beghards, or Beghins, and brothers and sisters of the free spirit. The common people alone called them Turlupins, a name which seems obviously to be connected with the wolfish howlings which these people, in all probability, would make in their religious ravings. Their subsequent name of the fraternity of poor men might have been the cause why the wandering rogues, called Bedlam beggars, assumed or obtained the title of Turlupins or Turlygolds, especially if their mode of asking alms was accompanied by the gesticulations of madmen.

Douer, III. of Shakespeare.

Turnera (tur'nér-j), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after W. Turner (about the middle of the 16th century), a physician, author (1551) of an English herbal.] A genus of polypetalous plants, type of the order Turneraceæ. It is characterized by usually perigynous stamens and by three or more multifid stigmas. There are 54 species, natives of tropical America, with one naturalized in the Old World. They are herbs or shrubs with scattered leaves, which are often gland-bearing at the base. The flowers are yellow, and usually solitary in the axils, peculiar in the frequent union of the peduncle with the petiole, the flower therefore seeming to spring from the base of the leaf. Several species are cultivated under glass for their very handsome flowers, which often resemble those of Thunbergia. T. alata is used as an astringent in Brazil. T. ulmifolia, a species widely distributed from the West Indies to Brazil, and known as holly-rose and sage-rose, is a reputed tonic and expectorant. The stimulant drug damiana is largely prepared from T. microphylla, and from T. diffusa and its variety aphrodisiaca, especially from the latter, which is a native of Texas, Mexico, and Lower California. This, which is widely known by the name damiana, is also used, in the form of a hot tea, as a blood-purifier and as a beverage, and is sold in preparations with spirits as a tonic or diuretic, as well as for alleviating colic and nervous disorders. See cut in next column.

Flowering Plant of Damiana (Turnera diffusa, var. aphrodisiaca). a, a flower; b, the calyx and the two bracts; c, the fruit.

Turneraceæ (tur-ne-rā'sē-ō), n. pl. [NL. (Kunth, 1823), < Turnera + -aceæ.] An order of polypetalous plants, of the cohort Passiflorales. It is characterized by bisexual flowers with five stamens, and a free ovary with three distinct filiform styles which are usually two-cleft and tabellately fringed. The 85 species are classed in 6 genera, of which Turnera is the type. They are mostly American and tropical; three yellow-flowered species of one genus, Piriqueta, extend into Florida or North Carolina.

turning-point (tér'ning-point), n. 1. The point on which a thing turns; the point at which motion in one direction ceases and that in a contrary or different direction begins; the point at which a decisive change takes place, as from good to bad, from increase to decrease, or the opposite.—2. In engin., a temporary bench or bench-mark, the exact elevation of which is determined in leveling before the instrument is advanced, as a starting-point for determining its height after resetting.

turning-rest (tér'ning-rest), n. 1. In hand-turning, a support, usually of iron, upon which the cutting extremity of the turning-tool is rested as on a fulcrum. It is usually socketed in an adjustable support clamped to the frame of the lathe.—2. A slide-rest.

turning-saw (tér'ning-sä), n. 1. A saw with a thin blade which can make a curved kerf, as for chair-backs, scrollwork, etc. Also called surp-saw, bow-saw, fram-saw, scroll-saw.—2. A keyhole-saw.

turning-steel (tér'ning-stél), n. A smooth hardened and tempered piece of round bar-steel, either with or without a handle, used to turn the edge of a tool, or give it a slightly flanged form, by rubbing.

turning-tool (tér'ning-tól), n. A sharp steel tool used in turning and shaping the ends of other tools in seal-engraving, to suit each style of work.

turning-tree (tér'ning-tré), n. The gallows.

And at the last she and her husband, as they deserved, were apprehended, arraigned, & hanged at the foresaid turning tree. Hall, Hen. VIII., p. 815.

turnip (tér'nip), n. [Formerly also turnep; perhaps orig. turn-up*, < turn, implying something round, + up, neip, < ME. nipe, < AS. nāp, a turnip; see neep.] The thick fleshy root of the plant designated by Linnaeus as Brassica Rapa, but now believed to be a variety, together with the rape (which see), of B. campestris, a plant found wild, in varieties corresponding to these plants, in Europe and Asiatic Russia (see marrow); also, the plant itself, a common garden and field crop. The rutabaga, or Swedish turnip, with smooth leaves, and root longer than broad, is referred with probability to the same source. The turnip proper has the root rounded, often broader than long, the root-leaves usually lobed, rough and hairy. The turnip was cultivated by the Greeks and Romans, and is now widely grown in temperate climates for use in soups and stews, or as a boiled vegetable, mashed or whole, and for feeding cattle and sheep, forming in Great Britain a valuable rotation crop. The young shoots of the second year, known as turnip-tops, are dressed for early greens. The turnip is little nutritious, containing from 90 to 92 per cent. of water. The rutabaga is somewhat more nutritious, but less easily grown. The varieties of both plants are numerous. The crop sometimes suffers from an affection called finger-and-toe or dactylotiza, in which the root divides into branches, apparently a tendency to revert to the wild state. Various insects attack the turnip. See turnip-fly.—Devil's turnip, the common bryony, Groenlandia dioica.—Indian turnip. See Indian.—St. Anthony's turnip, Ranunculus bulbosus, its bulbs being a favorite food of pigs, and St. Anthony being the patron of pigs. Also called St. Anthony's rape.—Swedish turnip. See rutabaga.—Teltow turnip, a variety grown in Germany, with roots but 1 inch thick and 3 inches long, the root having a very piquant flavor, whence it is much valued for soups and stews.—Turnip flea-beetle. See Phyllotreta and turnip-fly (c).—Turnip-stemmed cabbage, the kohlrabi.—Wild turnip. (a) The common turnip in its native state. See def. (b) Same as Indian turnip. [V. 8.] (See also lion's-turnip, prairie-turnip.)

turnip-aphid (tér'nip-af'id), n. The plant-louse Aphis rapae, which affects the turnip. Also turnip-aphis.

turnip-cabbage (tér'nip-kab'gē), n. Same as kohlrabi.

turnip-cutter (tér'nip-kut'ér), n. In agri., a root-cutter.

turnip-flea (tér'nip-flē), n. Same as turnip-fly (c).

turnip-fly (tér'nip-flī), n. One of several different winged insects which are injurious to turnips. (a) A dipterous insect of the genus Anthomyia, as A. radicum, whose larva lives in the turnip-root. See cut under Anthomyia. (b) A hymenopter of the genus Abathia, as A. centurion, whose larva, known as niggers, injure the leaves of the turnip. (c) A coleopter of the genus Phyllotreta, as P. (Phyllotreta) verna, a turnip flea-beetle. [Eng.]

turnip-maggot (tér'nip-mag'ot), n. The larva of Anthomyia radicum. See turnip-fly (a).

turnip-parsnip (tér'nip-pārs'nip), n. See parsnip.

turnip-pest (tér'nip-pest), n. Any of the insects which are very injurious to the turnip, and most of which have distinctive names. See turnip-fly, and cut under Phutella.

turnip-puller (tér'nip-pul'ér), n. An agricultural implement used for pulling turnips from the ground. E. H. Knight.

turnip-pulper (tér'nip-pul'pér), n. A root-cutter or root-pulper.

turnip-radish (tér'nip-rad'ish), n. A turnip-shaped variety of the common radish.

turnip-rooted (tér'nip-rō'ted), n. Having a short, thick, rounded root like a turnip.—Turnip-rooted celery. Same as cel-erie.—Turnip-rooted parsnip, the turnip-parsnip.

turnip-shaped (tér'nip-shāp), n. Shaped like a turnip; napiform.

turnip-shell (tér'nip-shēl), n. A shell of the family Turbinulidae, and especially of the genus Rapa. See cut under Turbinulidae.

turnip-tailed (tér'nip-tāld), n. Having a turnip-shaped or napiform tail, swollen at the base and suddenly tapering; notting a gecko.

turnipwood (tér'nip-wūd), n. The Australian rosewood, Syzygium glandulosum. The wood when fresh is of a deep red color and rose-scented. It is used for cabinet purposes, also for lining in houses and in ship-building. This name is from the smell of the bark, which resembles that of a Swedish turnip.

turnipy (tér'nip-i), a. [< turnip + -y.] Turnip-like. Encyc. Brit., I. 175. [Rare.]

Turnix (tér'niks), n. [NL. (Bonnaterre, 1790), said to be clipped from Cathurix, q. v.] A genus of hemipods or button-quails, giving name to the family Turnicidae; same as Hemipodius, and of prior date.

turnkey (tér'nkē), n. [< turn, v., + obj. key.] 1. The person who has charge of the keys of a prison, for opening and fastening the doors; a prison warden.—2. An instrument, now almost obsolete, used for extracting teeth.

turnout (tér'n'out), n. [< turn out; see under turn.] 1. The act of turning out or coming forth.

The bugles were sounding the turn-out. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xxx.

Specifically—2. A quitting of employment, especially with a view to obtain increase of wages or some other advantage; a strike.

All his business plans had received a check, a sudden pull-out, from this approaching turn-out. Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xviii.

3. One who has turned out for such a purpose; a striker.

Those were no true friends who helped to prolong the struggle by assisting the turn-outs. And this Boucher-man was a turn-out, was he not? Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xx.

4. A short side-track in a railway designed to enable one train to pass another.—5. People or things that have turned out; persons who have come out to see a spectacle, witness a performance at the theater, attend a public meeting, or the like.—6. A carriage or coach with the horses; also, carriages or equipages collectively.

The annual procession of his majesty's mails on the king's birthday was a sight equal, in the swiftness of the whole equipment, to the best turnout of the Coaching or Four-in-hand clubs of our day. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 50.

7. The net quantity of produce yielded; production.

If a large turn-out is necessary, carbonization may be effected in twelve or thirteen hours, but a slower process, say sixteen hours, gives better results. Spon's Encyc. Manuf., I. 10.

turnover (tér'n'ō'vēr), n. and a. [< turn over; see under turn.] I. n. 1. The act or result of turning over; as, a turnover in a carriage.—2. A kind of pie or tart in a semicircular form: so called because made by turning over one half of a circular crust upon the other.

Other children surveyed the group, and with envious eyes and watering mouths beheld the demolition of tarts and turnovers. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 109.

3. An apprentice whose indentures have been transferred or turned over to a new employer. Also called turnover apprentice. [Eng.]

That no Turn-overs be received by any Master Printer but from a Master Printer; and that no Master Printer turning over any Apprentice to another Master Printer may be permitted to take any other Apprentice in his place till the full time of the said Apprentice so turned over be expired. Case and Proposals of the Free Journeymen Printers, quoted in English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. clxi, note.

4. A piece of white linen formerly worn by cavalry over their stocks.—5. The amount of money turned over or drawn in a business, as in a retail shop, in a specified time.

The Simbirsk fair, having a turnover of some 6 million roubles, still maintains its importance. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 77.

6. A kitchen utensil: same as slice, 3 (h).

II. a. Turned over or down; capable of being turned over or down.—Turnover apprentice. See I. 3.—Turnover table. (a) A table the top of which is fitted with a movable panel which can be taken out and reversed. Such tables have sometimes a chess-board on one side of the movable panel, and cloth on the other for card-playing. (b) A turn-up table—that is, a table whose top can be moved into a vertical position.

turnpike (tér'n'pik), n. [< turn + pike.] 1. A frame of pikes or pointed bars, a kind of revolving cheval-de-frise, set in a narrow passage to obstruct the progress of an enemy.

Love storms his lips, and takes the fortress in, For all the bristled turn-pikes of his chin. F. Beaumont, Antiplaton.

Turnkey, 2

2. A turnstile.

I move upon my axle like a turnstile. B. Jonson, Staple of News, iii. 1.

3. A gate set across a road, in order to stop carriages, wagons, etc., and sometimes foot-travelers, till toll is paid; a toll-bar; a toll-gate. She married afterwards, . . . and now keeps with her old husband a turnstile, through which I often ride. Thackeray, Fitz-Boodle's Confessions.

4. A turnpike road.

The road is by this means so continually torn that it is one of the worst turnpikes round about London. Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, II. 17s. (Davies.)

5. A turnpike-stair. [Scotch.]—Turnpike road, a road on which turnpikes or toll-gates are established by law, and which are made and kept in repair by the toll collected from carriages, wagons, cattle, etc., which travel on them, or by the income derived from farming such toll.—Turnpike sailor, a beggar who goes about dressed as a sailor. [Thieves' cant.]

I became a turnpike sailor, as it's called, and went out as one of the Shallow Brigade, wearing a Guernsey shirt and drawers, or tattered trowsers. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 415.

turnpike-man (tér'n'pik-man), n. A man who collects tolls at a turnpike or toll-gate.

How in a trice the turnpike-men Their gates wide open threw. Comper, John Gilpin.

turnpike-stair (tér'n'pik-stār), n. A spiral or winding staircase. [Scotch.]

turn-pin (tér'n'pin), n. A conical plug for closing the open end of a pipe; a tube-stopper. E. H. Knight.

turn-plate (tér'n'plāt), n. A turn-table. [Eng.]

turn-poke (tér'n'pök), n. A large game-cock; a shake-lag.

The excellency of the broods, at that time, consisted in their weight and largeness, . . . and of the nature of what our sportsmen call shake-bags or Turn-pokes. Archæologia (1775), III. 142.

turn-row (tér'n'rō), n. The cross-row at the end of the furrows through which the plowman goes from one side to the other of his patch.

All down the turn-row between the ranks of corn. The Atlantic, LXI. 677.

turn-screw (tér'n'skrō), n. A screw-driver or a screw-wrench.

turn-serving (tér'n'sēr'ving), n. The act or practice of serving one's turn or promoting private interest. Bacon, Letters, p. 12.

turnsick (tér'n'sik), a. and n. [< ME. turnescke; < turn + sick.] I. a. Giddy; vertiginous.

Turne seke: vertiginosus; vertigo est illa infirmitas. Cath. Ang., p. 397.

II. n. Vertigo; also, the gid, sturdy, or staggers of sheep.

[Obsolete or provincial.]

turnside (tér'n'sid), n. A turnsiek disease of the dog. See the quotation.

Turnside is more frequently seen in the dog than tetanus, still it is by no means common. It consists in some obscure affection of the brain, resembling the "gid" of sheep, and probably results from the same cause. Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 327.

turnsol, turnsole (tér'n'sōl), n. [< ME. turnsol; < OF. (and F.) turnesol, dial. turnesole (= It. turnasole), < turner (= It. turnare), turn, + sol, sun; < L. sol: see turn and sol, and f. parasol.] 1. Any one of several plants regarded as turning with the movement of the sun.

This is the classical meaning of the word, which is the equivalent of heliotrope; and it has been so understood in later use, although according to some it refers to the appearance of the flowers at the summer solstice. In modern times the name has been applied (a) to the sunflower or wartwort, Euphorbia Helioscopia, rarely to the sunflower (Helianthus), more often to the heliotrope (Heliotropium), and (b) as in def. 2.

2. A plant, Chrozophora tinctoria, of the Euphorbiaceæ, found in the Mediterranean region and eastward to Persia and India. Its juice is rendered blue by ammonia and air, and linen dipped in it is a test for acids. The plant is of a poisonous character. The name is also given to a deep purple dye obtained from the plant.

Turnsole is good & holson for red wyne colowrynge. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 127.

3. Same as turnsole-blue.

turnsole-blue (tér'n'sōl-blō), n. A color obtained from archil, and formerly used for dyeing. It was claimed that the color was extracted from the turnsol, in order to keep its true source a secret. Also written turnsol-blue.

turnspit (tér'n'spīt), n. [< turn, v., + obj. spit.] 1. A person who turns a spit.

I am their turnspit, indeed; they eat and smell no roast-meat but in my name. B. Jonson, Mercury Vindicated.

2. A kind of dog of small size, long-bodied and short-legged, formerly used to work a kind of treadmill-wheel by means of which a spit was turned.

turnstile (térn'stíl), n. [< turn + stile]. A post surmounted by four horizontal arms which move round as a person passes through; a turnpike. Turnstiles are usually placed on roads, bridges, or other places, either to prevent the passage of cattle, horses, Turnstile, with Turnstile register.

vehicles, etc., but to admit that of persons, or to bar a passage until toll or passage-money is collected; they are also placed (sometimes with a turnstile-register) at the entrance of buildings, as where there is a charge for admission, or where it is desired to prevent the entrance of too many persons at one time.

turnstile-register (térn'stíl-rej'is-tér), n. A recording device for registering the number of persons passing through a turnstile, as at the entrance of a toll-bridge, a place of amusement, etc. It works by means of gear-wheels.

turnstone (térn'stôn), n. [< turn, v., + obj. stone]. A small grallatorial bird of the genus Streptopelia, allied both to plovers and to sandpipers; so called from its habit of turning over little stones or pebbles on the sea-shore in search of food. The common turnstone or sea-dotterel is S. interpres. In full summer plumage this is one of the handsomest of its tribe, being pied with black, brown, white, and chestnut-red, and having orange feet; it is 8 to 9 inches long, and about 17 in extent of wings. It is nearly cosmopolitan in its extensive migrations, and breeds in high latitudes. It is common in North America, especially coastwise, and there has many local names, as brant-bird, beach-bird, whale-bird, heart-bird, chicken-bird, calico-bird, calico-back, calico-jacket, checkered snipe, sparked-back, streaked-back, red-legs, red-legged plover, bishop plover, maggot-snipe, hose-foot snipe, chuckatuck, credlock, jinny, etc., derived from its appearance or habits. Among its Turnstone (Streptopelia interpres), in full summer plumage.

English names are Hebridean sandpiper and variegated plover, stone-peck & tangle-picker, etc. The black-headed turnstone, S. melanocephalus, is a different variety or species, mostly of a blackish color, found on the coasts of the North Pacific. See Streptopelia.—Plover-billed turnstone. Same as surf-bird. See hahn.

turn-table (térn'tā'bl), n. 1. A circular platform designed to turn upon its center, and supported by a series of wheels that travel upon a circular track laid under the edge of the platform. This is the original form of the railroad turntable, and is still in use. The platform is laid with a single line of rails, and the running-gear, pivot, wheels, etc.,

Turn-table.

a, side elevation of turn-table, pivoted at the center per A; b, rollers which support the ends and upon which the latter turn around on a circular flat-topped rail; c, c', fixed rails and turn-table rails respectively.

are sunk in a circular pit, so that the track is level with the connecting tracks. In some cases a second line of rails is laid on the platform, at right angles with the first. The turn-table for turning locomotives, as at the end of local lines, is now usually simply a wooden or iron girder, pivoted at the center and having each end supported on wheels that move on a circular track in a pit, the platform being dispensed with. Small turn-tables for moving cars from one track to another, as in narrow yards where there is no room for curves or switches, are sometimes used. Also called turning-plate.

2. A device used in tracing the circular elements for microscope-slides. E. H. Knight.

turntale (térn'tāl), n. [< turn, v., + tale]. An apostrophe. See the quotation under turnaway.
turn-tippet (térn'típ-et), n. [< turn, v., + tippet]. A turncoat; a time-server.

The priests, for the most part, were double-faced, turn-tippets, and flatterers.

Cranmer, Works (Parker Soc.), II. 15. (Davies.)

turn-under (térn'un dër), v. Same as fall-under.

turn-up (térn'up), v. [< turn up; see under turn]. 1. A disturbance; a commotion; a shindy or scrimmage.

I have seen many a turn-up, and some pitched battles among the yokels; and, though one or two were rather too sanguinary for my taste, no serious mischief was done.

Noctes Ambrosianæ, Dec., 1834.

2. One who or that which turns up unexpectedly or without prearrangement.

The type of men of which Emerson and Carlyle are the most pronounced and influential examples in our time, it must be owned, are comparatively a new turn-up in literature.

The Century, XXVII. 926.

[Colloq., or slang in both uses.]

turnus (tér'nus), n. [< NL. turnus, the specific name, < L. Turnus, a man's name.] The tiger-swallowtail, Papilio turnus, a large yellow black-striped swallow-tailed butterfly common in the United States. One striking variety of the female has the wings entirely black. The larva, of a deep velvety-green color, feeds on saffron, alder, willow, oak, apple, and various other trees.

Turnus, Papilio turnus, one half natural size.

turnverein (térn'fè-rin'), n. [G. turn-verein, < turnen, practise gymnastics (see turn, turner), + verein, union, association, < ver-, E. for-, + ein, one, = E. one]. An association for the practice of gymnastics according to the system of the turners. See turner, 4.

turnway (térn'wā), n. [< turn, v., + way]. An apostrophe. [Rare.]

Many times, when we have runne a long race in our tale spoken to the hearers, we do suddenly fly out & either speake or exclaim at some other person or thing, and therefore the Greekes call such a figure (as we do) the turnway or turntale.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 193.

turn-wrest (térn'wrest), n. Noting a plow having a reversible mold-board, whereby a furrow may be turned either to the right or to the left, according to the position of the mold-board.

Turonian (tū-ro'ni-an), n. [Irreg. < Touraine in France, where the system is well developed, + -ian]. In geol., a division of the Cretaceous system, according to the continental geologists. It lies between the Cenomanian and the Senonian, and is the equivalent of the English Lower Chalk, or "Chalk with out flints"—the chalk of the cliffs of Dover and Shakespeare Cliff. In the more detailed nomenclature of the French geologists it includes the Santonian and Campanian.

turpentine (tér'pen-tin), n. [Formerly also terpentin; < ME. terpentyn = MD. terpentijn, termentijn, D. terpentijn = G. Sw. Dan. terpentin, < OF. turbentine, terbentine, turpentine, terebenthine, ML. terebinthina, NL. terebinthina, turpentine, < L. terebinthina (see resin), fem. of terebinthinus, of the terebinth, < terebinthus, < Gr. τριβινθος, terebinth; see terebinth, and cf. terebinthine.] 1. An oleoresinous substance secreted by the wood or bark of a number of trees, all coniferous except the terebinth, which yields Chian turpentine. It consists chiefly of an essential hydrocarbon oil ($C_{10}H_{16}$) and a resin called colophony or rosin. The common turpentine is derived in France from the maritime pine, Pinus maritima (French or Bordeaux turpentine); in Russia and Germany, from the Scotch pine, P. sylvestris; in Austria and Corsica, from the Corsican pine, P. Læticæ; in the East Indies and Japan, from several pines; and in the United States, most largely in North Carolina, from the southern or long-leaved pine, P. palustris, and somewhat from the loblolly-pine, P. taeda. For other turpentines, see the phrases below. In the United States turpentine is obtained by cutting a pocket in the side of the tree (boxing), whence it is periodically collected. In France the less direct method is practised of removing a piece of bark and conducting the flow into earthen vessels. The crude turpentine is subjected to distillation, separating the oil, or so-called spirit or spirits of turpentine, from the rosin.

The oil in the case of the long-leaved pine constituting, it is said, 15 per cent., and in the case of the maritime pine 21 per cent. This when pure is limpid and colorless, of a penetrating peculiar odor, and a pungent bitterish taste. Spirit of turpentine is very extensively used in mixing paints and varnishes. In medicine it is stimulant and diuretic, an antelmintic, and externally a rubefacient and counter-irritant.

Men sellen a Gome, that Men clepen Turbentyn, in stede of Bayme; and thei putten there-to a litle Bayme for to geveit gode Odour. Mundeville, Travels, p. 51.

2. The oil or spirit of turpentine; turps: an ordinary but less precise use.—Aleppo turpentine, an article resembling, but not equal to, the Bordeaux turpentine, obtained in Provence from Pinus Halepensis.—Canada turpentine, Canada balsam. (See balsam.) During the American civil war, turpentine of the common sort was obtained from the Canadian red pine, Pinus resinosa.—Carpathian turpentine, usually called Carpathian balsam, a turpentine from the Swiss stone pine, Pinus Cembra.—Chian turpentine, the product of the turpentine-tree (which see), obtained by incision. It is of a feebly aromatic and terebinthinous flavor, not bitter or acrid, and of a characteristic pleasantly aromatic and terebinthinous scent. It was formerly of medicinal repute, then fell nearly into disuse, but latterly has been used with some success for cancer. Also Caprian or Scioturpentine.

Hungarian turpentine, the product of the dwarf pine, Pinus Pumilio, usually called Hungarian balsam, an article scarcely met with in commerce. Its essential oil is used as an inhalant in throat-diseases. Larch turpentine. Same as Pinetian turpentine. Mineral turpentine. A deodorized benzoin used in painting as a substitute for turpentine. Scio turpentine. Same as Chian turpentine.—Strasburg turpentine, the product of the silver fir, Abies alba, much resembling common turpentine, but pleasantly odorous, and not acrid and bitter. It was formerly much esteemed in medicine, but is now nearly obsolete. Turpentine camphor. Same as artificial camphor. See camphor.—Turpentine ointment. See ointment.—Venetian or Venice turpentine, the oleoresin of the European larch, Larix Europæa, secreted chiefly in its sapwood. It is less siccative than any other kind. It is useful for plasters, and is often prescribed in veterinary practice; but the genuine article is consumed mostly in continental Europe.

turpentine (tér'pen-tin), v. t. [< turpentina, n.] To apply turpentine to; rub with turpentine.

Or Martyr beat like Shrove-tide cocks with bats,
And fired like turpentine poor wailing rats.
Walcot (P. Pindar), Subjects for Painters.

turpentine-hack (tér'pen-tin-lak), n. A hand-tool for cutting or boxing pine-trees, to start the flow of crude turpentine. E. H. Knight.

turpentine-moth (tér'pen-tin-môth), n. Any one of several torridicid moths whose larvae bore the twigs and shoots of pine and fir, causing an exudation of resin and killing the twig. Leptia resinana is the common turpentine-moth of Europe; R. comstockiana and R. frustana are common in the United States.

turpentine-oil (tér'pen-tin-oil), n. The oil of turpentine. See terpentin. Also called pine-oil.—Hydrochlorate of turpentine-oil, artificial camphor. See camphor.

turpentine-still (tér'pen-tin-stil), n. An apparatus for distilling spirit from turpentine, or turpentine from pine-wood.

turpentine-tree (tér'pen-tin-tré), n. 1. The terebinth-tree, Pistacia Terebinthus, the source of Chian or Scio turpentine. Though the range of the terebinth is wide, the moderate demand is met by about 1,000 trees, some of them 800 or 900 years old, on the isle of Scio. See terebinth.

2. The Australian Suarcarpia laurifolia (Tristania alba) and Tristania conferta, trees affording an aromatic oil. See the generic names.

turpenticin (tér'pen-tin'ik), n. [< turpentin + -ic]. Related to turpentine.—Turpentic acid. Same as terebic acid (which see, under terebic).

turpeth (tér'peth), n. [Formerly also turbeth, turbith, turbid; < ME. turbyth, < OF. (and F.) turbith = Fr. turbid (ML. turpethum), < Ar. turbid, < Pers. turbid, a cathartic, turbid, a purgative root.] 1. The root of Ipomæa (Convolvulus) Turpethum, a plant of Ceylon, Malabar, and Australia, which has a cathartic property. (See Indian jalap, under jalap.) It is sometimes called vegetable turpeth, to distinguish it from mineral turpeth.—2. Turpeth-mineral.—Resin of turpeth. See resin.

turpeth-mineral (tér'peth-min-er-ál), n. A name formerly given to the yellow basic mercury sulphate ($HgSO_4 \cdot 2HgO$). It acts as a powerful emetic, and was formerly given in drops, but it is now seldom used internally. It is a very useful cathartic in cases of headache, anæmia, etc.

turpify (tér'pi-fi), v. t. [< L. turpificare, in pp. turpificatus, made foul; turpes, foul, base, + -ficare, < facere, make.] To contaminate; stigmatize.

O [that] . . . a woman . . . should thus turpify the reputation of my doctrine with the superscription of a fool! Sir P. Sidney, Warton Play, p. 120. (Davies.)

turpint, n. An obsolete corruption of terrapin.

Turpinia (tér-pin 'i-jā), n. [NL. (Ventenat, 1803), named after P. J. F. Turpin, a French naturalist and artist (1775-1840).] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Staphyleaceae. It is characterized by a three-lobed ovary indehiscent in fruit. The species are natives of Asia and America, especially in China, India, and the West Indies. They are smooth trees or shrubs with terete branchlets bearing opposite leaves, usually composed of opposite serrulate leaflets. The small white flowers form terminal and axillary spreading panicles. Some species produce an edible drupeous fruit. T. occidentalis, a tree from 20 to 30 feet high, is known as cassara-wood or curamante drumwood in Jamaica. (See drumwood.) T. pomifera of India and China, the tonk-hama of Burma, a very variable species from 12 to 40 feet high, in its typical state bears a fleshy, smooth, and roundish yellow, green, or reddish drupe, sometimes 2 inches in diameter.

turpis causa (tér'pis ká'zā), [L.: turpis, base, vile; causa, cause, reason; see cause.] In Scots law, a base or vile consideration on which no action can be founded. This would be called in English law a consideration contra bonos mores, or against public policy.

turpitude (tér'pī-tūd), n. [F. turpitude = It. turpitudine, < L. turpīto, baseness, < turpis, base.] Inherent baseness or vileness; shameful wickedness; depravity.

All manner of conceits that stir up any vehement passion in a man doo it by some turpitude or euill and vilenency that is in them.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 242.

How wouldst thou have paid
My better service, when my turpitude
Thou thus dost crown with gold!

Shak., A. and C., iv. 6. 33.

Whose political vices, at least, were imputable to mental incapacity, and to evil counsellors, rather than to any natural turpitude of heart. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 3.

turps (térps), n. A workmen's name for the oil or spirit of turpentine.

The spirit of turpentine will be designated by the word turps, which is in general use, has only one meaning, and has the advantage of brevity.

Spens' Encyc. Manuf., p. 225.

turqueti, n. [Appar. < OF. Turquet*, dim. of Ture, Turk; see Turk.] A figure of a Turk or Mohammedan.

Let anti-masques not be long; they have been commonly of fools, satyrs, baboons, wild men, anties, . . . turquets, nymphs, rustics, Cupids, statues moving, and the like. Bacon, Masques and Triumphs (ed. 1887).

turquoise (tér-koiz' or tér-kēz'), n. [A word of unstable form and pronunciation, the older forms being now largely displaced by turquoise after mod. E., the pron. wavering between that belonging properly to the word (tér'kis), and that belonging only to the later form turquoise, namely tér-koiz'; other pronunciations are tér-kez', tér-kes'. Now most commonly spelled turquoise, also turquoise, also turquois, turkois, turcois, also turkis (as in Tennyson); early mod. E. turquoise, turquois, turkoise, tourquoise, also turquois, rarely turkens; not found in ME. (but prob. existent); = D. turkois, turcoys, now turquois = MHG. turckis, turkoyis, turqis, G. turckis, turkis, now turkiss = Dan. turkis, tyrkis = Sw. turkos; < OF. turquoise, turquois, F. turquoise = Sp. turquesa = Pg. turquesa = It. turchese (ML. reflex turchasius), a turquoise, lit. 'Turkish stone' (being brought through Turkey ult. from Persia, or 'Turkish' meaning practically 'Asiatic') (cf. Turkey-stone); fem. of OF. Turquons, etc. (ML. Turcensis*, Turkish (see Turks), < Ture, Turk; see Turk.) An opaque blue or greenish-blue precious stone, consisting essentially of a phosphate of aluminium containing a little copper and iron. The true or oriental turquoise, a favorite ornamental stone in rings and other articles of jewelry, is found in a mountain region in Persia, and was originally brought into western Europe by way of Turkey. A variety found in New Mexico, usually of a greenish-blue color, is also used in jewelry. The principal locality is in the Los Cerillos Mountains, where the turquoise was mined by the Indians in very early times. A greenish turquoise is also found in Nevada. See how turquoise.

Turks and agate and almandine.

Tennyson, The Merman.

Reconstructed turquoise, imitation turquoise made of finely powdered ivory which is deposited in a solution of copper. This deposit is dried, leached very slowly, and cut. Rock-turquoise, a name given to a matrix of turquoise when small grains of turquoise are embedded in it. In commerce turquoises are said to come from the old and the new rock, the specimens from the old rock being true turquoise, and those from the new being odontolite, a fossil ivory stained with copper.

turquoise-green (tér-koiz'grēn), n. A somewhat pale color intermediate between green and blue.

turr (tér), n. [Burmese.] A three-stringed viol used in Burma.

turrel (tur'el), n. [Prob. ult. < OF. tour, a turn; see turn, turn, and cf. turrel.] An auger used by coopers.

turret¹ (tur'et), n. [< ME. turret, toret, < OF. tourette, touret, a turret or small tower; see tower. The W. tured, tower, is from the E.] 1. A little tower rising from or otherwise con-netted with a larger building; a small tower, often crowning or finishing the angle of a wall, etc. Turrets are of two chief classes—such as rise immediately from the ground, as staircase turrets, and such as are formed on the upper parts of a building, often corbelled out from the wall and not extending down to the ground, as bartizan turrets. See also cuts under peel and bartizan. 2. In medieval warfare, a movable building of a square form, consisting of ten or even twenty stories, and sometimes 180 feet high, usually moved on wheels, and employed in approaches to a fortified place for carrying soldiers, engines, ladders, etc.—3. Milit., a tower, often revolving, for offensive purposes, on land or water. See cut under monitor.—4. In her.: (a) A small slender tower, usually forming part of a bearing, being set upon a larger tower. See turreted, 3. (b) A bearing representing a kind of scepter having both ends alike and resembling the ends of the cross avellane. See turret. [Rare.]—5. In a railroad-car of American model, the raised part of the middle of the roof, utilized for affording light and ventilation.—6. In a lathe, a cylindrical or polygonal block on the bed, with holes around it for dies.

turret² (tur'et), n. [Prob. < OF. touret*, equiv. to touret, a ring in the mouth of a bit, < tourn, a turn; see turn.] Same as turret.

The silver turrets of his harness.

De Quincey, Eng. Mail Coach.

turreted (tur'et-ed), a. [< turret + -ed.] 1. Furnished with turrets.—2. In her., having small towers or turrets set upon it, as a castle or a city wall.—3. Formed like a tower; as, a turreted lamp.—4. In conch., having a long or towering spire; turriculated. Also turreted. See also cut under Turritellidæ.

turret-gun (tur'et-gun), n. A gun especially designed for use in a revolving turret.

turret-head (tur'et-hed), n. The revolving head of a bolt-cutter. E. H. Knight.

turret-lathe (tur'et-lāth), n. A screw-cutting lathe the slide of which is fitted with a cylindrical or polygonal block or turret pierced around its periphery with openings to receive dies, which are secured in place by set-screws. E. H. Knight.

turret-ship (tur'et-ship), n. An armor-plated ship of war with low sides, and having on the deck heavy guns mounted within one or more cylindrical iron turrets, which are made to rotate, so that the guns may be brought to bear in any required direction. See monitor, 7.

turribant (tur'i-bant), n. Same as turban.

turricula (tu-rik'ū-lā), n.; pl. turriculae (-lē). [ML. < L. turricula, a little tower, dim. of turreis, tower; see turret, 1, tower.] Any utensil, as a candlestick, having the form of a tower, especially in ornamental art.

turriculate (tu-rik'ū-lāt), a. [< L. turricula, a little tower (see turricula), + -ate¹.] 1. Having turrets; characterized by the presence of a number of small towers; turreted.—2. In conch., turreted. Also turriculated.

turriculated (tu-rik'ū-lāt), a. [< turriculate + -ed.] Same as turriculate, 2.

turritile (tur'i-lit), n. [< Turritiles.] A fossil ammonitoid cephalopod, the shells of which occur in the cretaceous and greensand formations, and which belongs to the genus Turritiles or a related form. The shell is spiral, turreted, and sinistral. There are about 37 species.

Turritiles (tur-i-lit'ēz), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1801), < L. turreis, a tower, + Gr. lithos, stone.] A genus of fossil cephalopods, generally referred to the family Strophoceratidae, but by some considered as the type of a family Turritillidæ; the turritiles, as T. costatus or T. calenatus.

turriort, n. [It. torrione.] A tower or bastion of a fortified city or post.

turrited, a. [< L. turritus, towered (< turreis, tower; see tower), + -ed.] See turreted, 4.

Turritella (tur-i-tel'ā), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1799), < L. turritus, towered, + -ella.] 1. The typical genus of Turritellidæ, having a long turriculate spirally striate shell, with rounded aperture, as T. imbricata.—2. [l. c.] Any member of this genus.

Turritellidæ (tur-i-tel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Turritella + -idæ.] A family of tanioglossate holostomous gastropods, whose typical genus is Turritella; the screws or screw-shells.

turritelloid (tur-i-tel'oid), a. [< Turritella + -oid.] Resembling a screw-shell; of or pertaining to the Turritellidæ. P. P. Carpenter.

tursio (tér'si-ō), n. [NL., < L. tursio, a kind of fish resembling the dolphin.] 1. A kind of dolphin, Delphinus tursio, of British and other North Atlantic waters, of rather large size and heavy build, with comparatively large and few teeth.—2. [cap.] Same as Tursiops.

Tursiops (tér'si-ops), n. [NL., < Tursio (see tursio) + Gr. opsis, aspect.] A genus of Delphinidae, named from the resemblance of its members to the tursio, and including such species as T. gilli of the North Pacific, which shares with various cetaceans the name cowfish. Also formerly Tursio (a name preoccupied in another connection).

turtle¹ (tér'tl), n. [< ME. turtel, tortle, turtel, turtul, also tortor (also turtre, < OF.), < AS. turtla = G. turtel (taube) = OF. turtre, F. tourtrel (also dim. tourtereau, tourtrelle) = Pr. tortre = Sp. tórtora, tórtola = It. tortora, tortola, < L. turtor, a turtle; a reduplicated form, prob. imitative of the cooing of a dove.] A turtle-dove.

The wedded turtel with her herte trewe.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 355.

Greenland turtle, the sea-pigeon, or Greenland sea-dove, Uria grylle. See cut under guillemot.

turtle² (tér'tl), n. [Formerly also tortle; prob. a corruption of tortoise, or an accom. form, first used by English sailors, of the Sp. tortuga or Pg. tartaruga, a tortoise; see tortoise. In either case the alteration appears to have been assisted by a whimsical association with *turtle*¹. The application to the smaller land-tortoises seems to be later.] 1. A tortoise; any chelonian or testudinate; any member of the Chelonia or Testudinata (see the technical names); especially, a marine tortoise, provided with flippers; absolutely, the green turtle, as Chelonia midas (see cut below), highly esteemed for soup. See cuts referred to under tortoise, also cuts under Aspidonectes, Eretmochelys, periotic, Pleurospondylia, slider, and stinkpot.

The tortoise, which they call turtle, cuts like veal.

S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 21.

A turtle—which means a tortoise—is fond of his shell.
O. W. Holmes, Professor, ii.

2. The detachable segment of the cylinder of a rotary printing-machine which contains the types or plates to be printed: so called from its curved surface. In practice, the turtle is removed from the machine to the type-setting room. The types are made up on the curved surface, and firmly held in place by rebated column-rules, thicker at the top than at the bottom, and firmly grooved in the turtle. When the types have been locked up by screws on the turtle, they can be placed on the machine for printing without risk of falling out, or they can be molded in thin curved form by the papier-mâché process, and the curved plate made therefrom can be used in printing. The stereotype method is preferred.—Bastard turtle, Thalassochelys kempi.—Box-turtle. See box-tortoise, Cistudo, emder, Pyris.—Chicken-turtle. Same as chicken-tortoise. [Southern U. S.]—Diamond-backed turtle. See diamond-backed.—Greaved turtle, a tortoise of the genus Podocnemis, as P. expansa.—Green turtle, one of several species of turtles, belonging to the natural order Chelonia, family Cheloniidae, and genus Chelonia (which see for the technical zoological characters). They are all marine, and feed almost exclusively on algae or seaweeds. The common species turtle-deck (têr'tl-dêk), n. See deck, 2.

turtle-dove (têr'tl-dôv), n. [< ME. turteldoufe = D. tortelduif = OHG. turtulatuba, turtituba, MHG. turteltube, turteltube, G. turteltaube = Dan. turteldue = Sw. turteldufva; as *turtle*¹ + *dove*¹.] 1. The turtle; any member of the genus Turtur in a broad sense; specifically, T. vulgaris, a dove native in the British Islands and other parts of Europe, and thence extending into Africa and Asia. There are many others, of most parts of the Old World, as the Cambayan, T. senegalensis; among them is T. risorius, commonly seen in captivity and called ring-dove.

Turtle-dove (Turtur vulgaris).

2. The common Carolina dove or pigeon, Zenaidura macroura. Also called mourning-dove. See cut under dove. [Local, U. S.]—3. The Australian dove Streptopelia cucullata. [Local.]

turtle-egging (têr'tl-eg'ing), n. The act or industry of taking turtles' eggs. The turtle digs a hole in the sand, in which the eggs are deposited and then covered over. To ascertain where the nest is located a sharp stick or iron rod is used to prod the ground.

turtle-footed (têr'tl-fût'ed), a. Slow-footed.
Turtle-footed peace. Ford. (Imp. Dict.) turtle-grass (têr'tl-gràs), n. See Thalassia.

turtle-head (têr'tl-hed), n. See Chelone, 2.

turtle-peg (têr'tl-peg), n. The spear or harpoon used in striking turtles; a peg. It is a small sharp piece of iron, made fast to a cord, and mounted on a long shaft. The turtle is pegged by a thrust into the shell, where the head of the spear is held firmly; the staff is then withdrawn, and the turtle is brought in by the cord. [Florida.]

turtler (têr'tl-er), n. [< *turtle*² + -er.] One who makes a business of hunting for turtles or their eggs.

turtle-run (têr'tl-run), n. A turtle-crawl. [Florida.]

turtle-shell (têr'tl-shel), n. 1. Tortoise-shell; especially, the darker and less richly mottled tortoise-shell used for inlaying in wood, etc.—2. In conch., the turtle-cowry.

turtle-soup (têr'tl-sôp'), n. A rich soup the chief ingredient of which is turtle-meat.—Mock-turtle soup. See mock-turtle.

turtle-stone (têr'tl-stôn), n. In geol., a septarium.

turtling (têr'tl-ing), n. [Verbal n. of *turtle*², v.] The act or method of catching turtles; the business of a turtler.

turtosa (têr-tô'sä), n. The African teak or oak, Oleifolia africana.

turtout, n. [ME., also tortor (also turtre, < OF. turtre), < L. turtur, a turtle; see *turtle*¹.] A turtle-dove.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 21.

Turtur (têr'têr), n. [NL., < L. turtur, a turtle; see *turtle*¹.] A genus of doves, based by Selby in 1835 upon the common turtle of Europe, Columba turtur of Linnaeus, now called Turtur communis, vulgaris, or auritus. (See cut under turtle-dove.) There are many other Old World species, among them T. risorius, probably the turtle of Scripture.

turves, n. An obsolescent plural of *turf*¹.

turvy-topsy, adv. Same as topsy-turvy. (Cited by F. Hall, The Nation, March 28, 1880, p. 268.)

turwar (tur'wâr), n. [E. Ind.] The tanning-bark obtained in India from Cassia auriculata.

Tuscan (tus'kan), a. and n. [= F. Toscan, < It. Toscana, < L. Tuscanus, < Tuscanus, Flavescens, Tuscan. Cf. Etruscan.] 1. a. Pertaining to Tuscany, a former grand duchy, now a compartment of the present kingdom of Italy, corresponding generally to the ancient Etruria. —Tuscan order, one of the five orders of architecture, according to Vitruvius and Palladio. It admits of no ornaments, presents the lack of refinement of the other Roman orders, and the columns are never fluted. It differs so little, however, from the Roman Doric that it is generally regarded as being only a variety of the latter. See Doric. — Tuscan straw, plaited straw of the yellow color, used for making hats and fine mats and baskets.

II. n. 1. An inhabitant of Tuscany. — 2. In arch., the Tuscan order.

tush¹ (tush), n. [< ME. tusch, tusch; an assimilated form of *tusk*¹.] A long pointed tooth; a tusk; specifically, one of the four canine teeth of the horse.

Tuscan Order, after Vignola.

That great wolf (Gardiner), . . . whose teeth are like to the venomous tushes of the ramping lion.

Bacon, Works (Parker Soc.), III. 237.

And whom he strikes his crooked tushes slay.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 624.

tush² (tush), interj. [Formerly also twish; cf. but and pish.] An exclamation expressing rebuke, impatience, or contempt, and equivalent to 'pshaw! be silent!'; as, tush! tush! never tell me such a story as that.

There is a choleric or disdainful interjection used in the Irish language called bough, which is as much in English as twish.

Stanislaus, Descrip. of Ireland, i. (Holinshead's Chron., I.).

Tush, man; in this topsy-turvy world friendship and bosom-kindness are but made covers for mischief, means to compass ill.

Chapman, Widow's Tears, v.

tush² (tush), v. i. [< *tush*², interj.] To express impatience, contempt, or the like by the exclamation "Tush!"

'Eddie tushed and pshawed more than once at the message.

Scott, Ivanhoe, xlv.

tushed (tush), a. [< *tush*¹ + -ed.] Having tushes; tusked.

tusk¹ (tusk), n. [< ME. tusk, also transposed tur (also assimilated tusch, tusch; see *tush*¹), < AS. tasc, also transposed tur = OFries. tusk, tusch = Icel. toskr (cf. Gael. toisg, < E.), a tusk, tooth; prob., with orig. adj. formative -k or -sk (as in AS. -isc, E. -ish), from the orig. form of tooth (AS. tôth, Goth. tanthus, etc.), the radical th + k or th + sk reducing to sk, as th + t or th + st reduces to st. The supposition that AS. tase is a contr. of twisc*, < twi, two, though phonetically tenable (cf. tuskar, twiscar), does not meet the sense.] 1. A long pointed tooth; especially, a tooth long enough to protrude from the lips when the mouth is closed. Tusks are extremely prominent in some animals, as elephants, mastodons, and other proboscideans; the narwhal among cetaceans; various pachyderms, as the hippopotamus, boar, and babirusa; the walrus among pinniped carnivores; and the fossil saber-toothed tigers among ordinary a, tusk of walrus (canine tooth); b, tusk of elephant (incisor tooth).

carnivores. Tusks may be upper or lower; they are usually upper, but in the diatherium lower. They are either incisors or canines in different animals, but are usually canines. They are always paired, except in the narwhal. The single developed upper incisor of the male narwhal is the longest tusk known, reaching a length of 10 or 12 feet, and it is spirally grooved as if twisted. Elephants' tusks are upper incisors, and furnish most of the ivory of commerce. The tusks of the walrus are upper canines; those of the boar tribe are canines, both upper and lower. The tusks of the diatherium are a pair of lower incisors turned down out of the mouth. The so-called tusks or tushes of the horse are ordinary canines. See cuts under babirusa, boar, Diatherium, elephant, Mastodontine, monodon, narwhal, Phacocharus, saber-toothed, and walrus.

of the West Indies is Chelonia midas; that of Pacific waters is C. virgata. The former comes on the coast of the United States, from the Gulf of Mexico northward, occasionally even to Long Island Sound or even on the New England fishing-banks. It attains great size, individuals having been taken weighing from 600 to 800 pounds. It lives chiefly in deep water, but also seeks the mouths of rivers and estuaries. It breeds from April till July, and in April, and especially in May, large numbers come ashore to lay their eggs, which are much esteemed and eagerly sought for. The animal itself is celebrated as the source of real-turtle soup. The Pacific species ranges along the whole southern coast of California, and is regularly taken to the San Francisco markets.—Hawk-billed or hawk's-bill turtle, a marine turtle, the caret, Eretmochelys imbricata, the source of commercial tortoise-shell. See cut under Eretmochelys.—Loggerhead turtle. See loggerhead, 4.—Mock turtle. See *mock*¹.—Painted turtle. Same as painted terrapin (which see, under terrapin).—Soft-shelled or soft turtle. See soft-shelled, Trionchidae, and cut under Aspidonectes.—To turn turtle, to capsize; said of a vessel. [Naut. slang.] (See also alligator-turtle, land-turtle, snail-turtle, *sea-turtle*², snapping-turtle.)

turtle² (têr'tl), v. i.; pret. and pp. turtled, ppr. turtling. [< *turtle*², n.] To pursue or capture turtles; make a practice or business of taking turtles.

When going on a turtling excursion a gaper is caught, and the more experienced natives have no great difficulty in procuring one when required.

Anthrop. Jour., XIX. 349.

turtleback (têr'tl-bak), n. 1. A West Indian helmet-shell, Cassia tuberosa. Imp. Dict.—2. Something having the shape of a turtle's back. (a) A rude stone implement, of a shape suggesting the name, by some supposed to represent a failure to chip out a more elaborate or perfect form.

The familiar turtle-back or one-faced stone, the double turtle-back or two-faced stone, together with all similar rude shapes.

W. H. Holmes, Amer. Anthropol., Jan., 1890, p. 13.

(b) An arched protection erected over the upper deck of a steamer at the bow, and often at the stern also, to guard against damage from the breaking on board of heavy seas; a whaleback.

turtle-cowry (têr'tl-kon'ri), n. A large hand-sized cowry, Cypræa testudinaria.

turtle-crawl (têr'tl-kral), n. 1. The track of a turtle to and from its nest.—2. A pen constructed in the water for confining turtles. [Florida.]

But bit his lip for felonous despatch,
And gnash't his yron tusk at that displeasing sight.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. x. 33.

2. A sharp projecting point resembling in some degree a tusk or tooth of an animal. Specifically—(a) A tooth of a harrow. (b) The share of a plow.

Shortly plough or harrow Shall pass o'er what was Ismail, and its tusk
Be unimpeded by the proudest monarch.
Byron, Don Juan, vii. 63.

(c) In locks, a sharp projecting point or claw which forms a means of attachment or engagement.
3. In carp., a bevel shoulder on a tenon to give it additional strength.—4. A tooth-shell. See Dentalium, and cut under tooth-shell.

tusk¹ (tusk), v. [< tusk¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To gore with the tusks.

My poor mistress went distract and mad
When the boar tusk'd him. Keats, Endymion, iii.

2. To move, turn, or thrust with the tusks.

The wild boar has tusked up his vine.
Dickens, London's Tempe (Works, ed. Pearson, IV. 120).

II. t. intrans. To gnash the teeth, as a boar; show the tusks.

Never tusk, nor twirl your dibble; . . . you shall not fright me with your lion-clap, sir, nor your tusks.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii. 1.

tusk² (tusk), n. [A reduced form of torusk. Cf. cusk.] A fish: same as torusk.

tusk³ (tusk), n. [Early mod. E. tuske, also assimilated tushe; cf. Dan. dusk, a tuft, tassel, Sw. dial. tuss, a wisp of hay; cf. also W. tus, tusur, a wisp, bundle. The relations of these forms are uncertain. Cf. tussock.] A tuft; a bush. Palsgrave.

tuskar (tus'kär), n. [Also tushkar, twiscar; cf. Icel. tufskeri, a turf-cutter (cf. tufskurdlir, turf-cutting), < torg, turf, + skara, cut; see turf¹ and shear.] An implement of iron with a wooden handle, for cutting peat. [Orkney and Shetland.]

tusked (tuskt), a. [< tusk¹ + -ed².] Having tusks; tusky: used in heraldry only when the tusks are of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing. Also tushed.

His wide mouth did gape
With huge great teeth, like to a tusked bore.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. vii. 5.

tuskee (tus'kē), n. [Amer. Ind.] The prairie-turnip, Psoralea esculenta. See Psoralea.

tusker (tus'kär), n. [< tusk¹ + -er¹.] An elephant whose tusks are grown and retained.

Every one knows that elephants are found there [in Ceylon], but it is not so generally known that tuskers are so rare that not one male in 300 has tusks.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 587.

tusk-shell (tusk'shel), n. A tooth-shell: same as tusk¹, 4.

tusk-tenon (tusk'ten'on), n. A tenon strengthened by having a shoulder or step on the lower side. This form has the advantage of permitting the mortise into which it enters to be cut at a higher point in a horizontal beam, thus weakening the latter less than if cut at or below the neutral line of deflection.

Tusk-tenon.
A, tenon; B, tusk.

tusk-vase (tusk'väs), n. A decorative vase formed of a part of the tusk of an elephant, hollowed and mounted with the point downward on a stand; hence, a vase of any material resembling a tusk so mounted.

tusky (tus'ki), a. [< tusk¹ + -y¹.] Having tusks; tusked; as, the tusky boar. Pope, Odyssey, xiv. 124.

tusmoser, n. See tuzzimuzzy.

tussah-silk (tus'ä-silk), n. Same as tusser-silk. Spous' Encege, Manuf., I. 520.

tussal (tus'äl), a. [< tussis + -al.] Relating to or caused by cough.

tussemoser, n. See tuzzimuzzy.

tusser (tus'er), n. [Also tussur, tussore, tussch, tussah, tussa, tusar; prob. at first in comp. tusser-silk, lit. 'shuttle-silk,' perhaps from the form of the cocoon (Yule), < Hind. tussar, < Skt. tassar, trasara, shuttle.] 1. Same as tusser-silk.—2. An oak-feeding silkworm, Anthracis mylitta, furnishing a silk of great strength, but of coarse quality and hard to reel.

tusser-silk (tus'er-silk), n. The raw silk produced by various silkworms other than the ordinary Scireria mori, as by Anthracis mylitta. The silk is naturally of a dark fawn color; the cloths made from it are generally plainly woven, without patterns, brocading, or even cords.

tusser-worm (tus'er-werm), n. Same as tusser, 2.

tusses (tus'ez), n. pl. [Appar. for tushes, pl. of tush, var. of tusk; cf. tusk¹, n., 3.] Projecting stones left in masonry to tie in the wall of a building intended to be subsequently annexed. Halliwel.

And also forsaide Richarde sall schote out tusses in the west ende for making of a stepill.
Contract for Cutlerick Church, Yorkshire (1412), quoted in (N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 490).

tussicular (tu-sik'ü-lär), a. [< L. tussicularis, < tussicula, dim. of tussis, cough.] Of or pertaining to a cough.

Tussilago (tus-i-lä'gö), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier in Lobel, 1576), < L. tussilago, the herb coltsfoot.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Scutellionideæ, type of the subtribe Tussilaginideæ. It is characterized by radiate flower-heads with erect miseriate involucre bracts, the disk-flowers with undivided styles. The only species, T. Farfara, the coltsfoot, is widely distributed through north temperate regions in the Old World, in America naturalized in the North Atlantic states and Canada. It is a perennial herb, more or less covered with snowy wool, growing from a deep-seated rootstock. The leaves are radical, large and roundish, and somewhat angulate; the flower-heads are yellow, of medium size, and solitary upon a scale-bearing scape. See coltsfoot (with cut), and compare coughwort and footfoot.

tussis (tus'is), n. [L.] In med., a cough. Compare peritussis. [Now rare.]

tussle (tus'li), n. [Formerly also tussel; a var. with shortened vowel, of tumble: see tumble.] A struggle; a conflict; a scuffle. [Colloq.]

"It is some comfort, when one has had a sair tussel," continued the captain, . . . "that it is in a fair laddy's service."
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, li.

tussle (tus'li), v. i.; pret. and pp. tussled, ppr. tussling. [< tussle, n.] To struggle; wrestle confusedly; scuffle. [Colloq.]

tussock (tus'ök), n. [Formerly also tussuck, supposed to be another form, with accom. dim. suffix -ock, of tusk³.] 1. A clump, tuft, or small hillock of growing grass.—2. Same as tuft², 1.

There shoulde not any such tussocks nor tufts be seen as there be, nor such laying out of the hair.
Latimer, Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

3. A tussock-moth, as of the genus Orgyia (which see); a vaporar: so called from the tufted larvæ. The larva of the white-marked tussock, O. leucostigma, is a very destructive caterpillar in the United States. The pale tussock is the European O. pudibunda: so called in England.

4. Same as tussock-grass.

tussock-caterpillar (tus'ök-kat'er-pil-är), n. The larva of any tussock-moth.

tussock-grass (tus'ök-gräs), n. 1. A tall and elegant grass, Poa flabellata (Dactylis cæspitosa), a native of the Falkland Islands, Tierra del Fuego, and southern Patagonia, delighting in boggy and peaty ground. It grows in great tufts or tussocks sometimes 5 or 6 feet in height, the long tapering leaves gracefully recurved. The plant is highly nutritious, containing a large amount of saccharine matter, and is sought after by cattle. Several attempts have been made to establish it in seaside districts in Scotland.
2. In Australia, a plant of the lily family, Lomandra (Xerotes) longifolia, considered the best native substitute for esparto. Though it is of taller growth in wet ground, the best quality is from dry lands. Also called mat-rush. Spous' Encege, Manuf.
3. A tufted grass, Jira cæspitosa. Britten and Holland. [Prov. Eng.]

Tussock-grass (Poa flabellata).

tussock-moth (tus'ök-möth), n. One of various bombycid moths whose larvæ are tufted; a tussock; a vaporar: as, the hickory tussock-moth, Halosidota carya, the larva of which feeds mainly on the foliage of hickory, but also upon other forest- and orchard-trees in the United States. See cut under Orgyia.

tussock-sedge (tus'ök-sej), n. A sedge-plant, Carex stricta, growing in swampy grounds in dense clumps, the bases of which at length become elevated into hummocks.

tussocky (tus'ök-i), a. [< tussock + -y¹.] Abounding in or resembling tussocks or tufts.

tussore, n. Same as tusser.

tussuck¹, n. An old spelling of tussock.

tussy, n. An old spelling of tazzy.

tut¹ (tut), v. i. [Var. of toot¹, toot¹.] To project.

tut² (tut), n. [Also tote; see tut¹, r., and toot¹.] A hassock; a footstool. [Prov. Eng.]

Paid for a tut for him that draws the bellows of the organ to sit upon. ivd.
Chardens Accents of Cheddle, 1637. (Davies.)

tut³ (tut), n. [Also tote; origin obscure.] A piece of work; a job.

tut³ (tut), v. i.; pret. and pp. tutted, ppr. tutting.

[< tut³, n.] To do work by the tut or tote; work by the piece. Grass. [Prov. Eng.]

tut⁴ (tut), interj. [Cf. tush² and trut.] An exclamation used to cheek or rebuke, or to express impatience or contempt. It is synonymous with tush².

Tut, tut!

Grace me no grace, nor uncle me no uncle.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 3. 87.

Tut, I am confident in thee, thou shalt see I.

B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 3.

tut⁴ (tut), v. i.; pret. and pp. tutted, ppr. tutting. [< tut⁴, interj.] To express impatience, contempt, or the like by the interjection tut.

In another moment the member of parliament had forgotten the statist, and was pishing and tutting over the Globe or the Sun.
Bubber, Caxtons, viii. 3.

tutaget (tüt'ätj), n. [< L. tutari, protect, defend, + -age; or, rather, an error for tutelage (?).] An object of tutelage; tutelage.

Trim up her golden tresses with Apollo's sacred tree, Whose tutage and especial care I wish her still to be.
Drayton, Eclogues, iii.

tutamen (tüt-tä'men), n.; pl. tutamina (-tam'i-nä). [L., defense, protection, < tutare, watch, protect, defend, freq. of tueri, watch: see tuition.] In anat., a defense or protection; that which makes safe or preserves from injury.—Tutamina cerebri, the scalp, skull, and membranes of the brain.—Tutamina oculi, the eyelids and their appendages.

tutament (tüt'tä-ment), n. [< L. tutamentum, protection, defense, < tutare, watch, protect, defend: see tutamen.] Protection.

The holy Crosse is the true Tutament, Protecting all ensheltered by the same.
Davies, Holy Roode, p. 19. (Davies.)

tutamina, n. Plural of tutamen.

tutania (tüt-tä'ni-ä), n. [NL., an intentional or accidental variant of tutia: see tutty².] The trade-name of a variety of Britannia metal. The word is not in common use, and the reported analyses of alloys said to be called by the name tutania differ greatly from each other. So-called "English tutania" (according to Hioris) is an alloy of equal parts of tin, antimony, bismuth, and brass.

tutet, v. An obsolete form of toot¹, toot².

tutelage (tüt'te-läj), n. [< tutele + -age.] 1. Protection; guardianship: as, the king's right of signiory and tutelage.

The childhood of the European nations was passed under the tutelage of the clergy. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.
2. The state of being under a guardian; care or protection enjoyed.

Your wisdom is too ripe to need instruction
From your son's tutelage. Ford, Broken Heart, ii. 2.

tutelar (tüt'te-lär), a. [= F. tutelaire = Sp. Pg. tutelar = It. tutelare, < LL. tutularis, < L. tutela, a watching, guardianship, protection: see tutela.] 1. Having the guardianship or charge of protecting a person or a thing; guardian; protecting: as, tutelar genii; tutelar goddesses.

God, that dwells in us, will sustain the building and repair the building out of ourselves: that is, he will make us tutelar angels to one another. Donne, Sermons, v.

2. Pertaining to a protector or guardian; tending to guard or protect; protective: as, tutelar powers. Landor.

tutulary (tüt'te-lä-ri), a. [< LL. tutularis: see tutelar.] Same as tutelar.

I could easily believe that not only whole countries but particular persons have their tutulary and guardian angels.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 33.

tutelet (tüt'tel), n. [< F. tutele = Sp. Pg. It. tutela, < L. tutela, a watching, guardianship, protection, < tueri, pp. tuitus, tutus, watch, guard: see tuition.] Guardianship: tutelage.

He was to have the Tutele and Ward of his Children.
Howell, Letters, I. ii. 15.

tutenag (tüt'te-nag), n. [Also tutenague, toot-nagur, formerly tutlinag, toothnagur; < F. tutnagur, tutenage, toutnagur, toutenage, tutnagur, tutenague, etc., = Sp. Pg. tutenaga; prob. < Pers. Ar. tätiga, an oxid of zinc (see tutty²), + (?) Pers. -näk, an adj. suffix, or Hind. näga, lead.] The name given to the zinc imported into Europe from China and the East Indies, and formerly, especially in the second half of the eighteenth century, an article of considerable commercial importance—this metal having been purchased by the Dutch in China and by them distributed through the East Indies and supplied to India proper, whence more or less of it found its way to Europe, where its manufacture seems to have been begun on a small scale, both in Germany and in England, about 1730. It is said that the name tutenag was first given to an alloy imported from the East by the Portuguese, and that this alloy was the gong-metal of the Chinese, which is a variety of bronze. This would seem to be probable, since the first mention of this alloy, so far as known, is that of Libavius, who, in his work "De Natura Metallorum," published in 1597, describes a white bronze (æs album), which he says is not zinc, but a peculiar kind of tin brought from the East Indies, and which is sonorous, for which reason it was called by the Spaniards tintinnus, from tintinnare, 'to resound.' Whether this name was a variant of tutenag (also spelled in a great variety of other ways, among which tintinnague) or an independent designation of the alloy is not known. The whole matter of the early nomenclature of zinc is extremely obscure. See zinc.

tutorism (tū'ti-ōr-izm), n. [< L. tutor, comp. of tutus, safe (pp. of tueri, watch, guard; see tutium), + -ism.] Rigorism, especially in a mild form.

tutorist (tū'ti-ōr-ist), n. [< tutor(ism) + -ist.] A rigorist; especially, one who holds the doctrines of rigorism in a less rigid or severe form.

Tutivillust, n. [ML.: see titivill.] A demon who was said to collect all the fragments of words which the priests had skipped over or mutilated in the performance of the service, and to carry them to hell. Hallivell.

Tutivillus, the devil of hell,
He wryeth har names, sothe to tel, admissa extrahantes, . . .
For his love that gon der hoght, hold gon stil, and fangel noght, sordem aperte deprecantes.

Rel. Antiq., I. 257.

tut-mouthed (tut'moutht), a. Having a projecting under jaw. Holland.

tut-nose (tut'nōz), n. A snub-nose. [Prov. Eng.]

tutor (tū'tor), n. [Early mod. E. also toutour, tutor; < ME. tutour, < OF. tuteur, F. tuteur = Sp. Pg. tutor = It. tutore, < L. tutor, a watcher, protector, guardian, < tueri, protect; see tutium. In the legal sense the word is directly from the L. tutor.] 1. A guardian.

And kynde wit he wardeyn goure welthe to kepe,
And tutour of zowre tresoure and take hit zow atte nece.
Piers Plowman (C), ii. 52.

I'll have mine own power here,
Mine own authority; I need no tutor.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, v. 1.

The guardian—the tutor in Scottish phrase—of the orphans and their land.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 252.

2. In law, the guardian of a boy or girl in pupilarity. In the absence of other provision, the father is the tutor, and failing him there may be a tutor nominate, a tutor-at-law, or a tutor dative. A tutor nominate is one nominated in a testament, etc., by the father of the child or children to be placed under guardianship. A father may nominate any number of tutors. A tutor-at-law is one who acquires his right by the mere disposition of law, in cases where there is no tutor nominate, or where the tutor nominate is dead, or cannot act, or has not accepted. A tutor dative is one named by the sovereign on the failure of both tutors nominate and tutors-at-law. In civil law it was originally considered as a right of the nearest relative to be named the tutor in order to preserve the fortune for the family, and it was only gradually that the protection of the infant himself came to be considered the principal object, and the filling of the office of tutor more as a duty which had to be fulfilled unless there were special circumstances to excuse, than as a right which a relative could claim.

3. One who has the care of instructing another in various branches or in any branch of learning; a private instructor; also, a teacher or instructor in anything.

Thou shalt be as thou wast,
The tutor and the feeder of my riots.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 5. 66.

4. In Eng. universities, an officer who is specially intrusted with the care of the undergraduates of his college.

By the middle of the sixteenth century, the modern system of admitting students not on the foundation was fully established; and, as a natural result, the office of tutor in the present meaning of the term then first appears, being probably introduced at King's Hall, the chief of the earlier foundations absorbed in Trinity College, "where the students were much younger than elsewhere."

Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 403.

The college officer with whom the Undergraduate has most frequent contact is the Tutor. He not only directs the studies of his pupils, but also deals with them in all points, material as well as intellectual. He collects the College bills, and generally acts as agent for the College in all business transactions with its members. . . . The Tutor himself does not necessarily lecture or teach.

Dickens's Dict. of Cambridge, p. 124.

5. In U. S. colleges, a teacher subordinate to a professor, usually appointed for a year or a term of years.

tutor (tū'tor), v. t. [< tutor, n.] 1. To have the guardianship or care of.—2. To instruct; teach.

Then gave I her, . . . tutor'd by my art,
A sleeping potion. Shak., R. and J., v. 3. 243.
She tills her song with tutored powers,
Or mocks each casual note.

Wordsworth, The Contrast, i.

tutorage (tū'tor-āj), n. [< tutor + -age.] The office, occupation, or authority of a tutor or guardian; guardianship.

Children care not for the company of their parents or tutors, and men will care less for theirs, who would make them children by usurping a tutorage.

Government of the Tongue.

tutress (tū'tor-es), n. [Formerly also tuteresse, tutress; < tutor + -ess.] A female tutor; an instructress; a governess.

What a good helper, what a true instructor!

In all good arts a tutresse and conductor.

Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 177).

tutorial (tū-tō'r-i-āl), a. [< LL. tutorius, belonging to a guardian (< L. tutor, a guardian; see tutor), + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or exercised by a tutor or instructor.

The Commissioners had two purposes plainly before them, which events have shown to be incompatible in the form which they were made to take. The one was to enlarge and strengthen the Professoriate, the other was to extend and encourage what is called the Tutorial system, by which is meant the instruction of the undergraduates in work for their examinations by certain College officials.

Contemporary Rec., XVI. 928.

tutorially (tū-tō'r-i-āl-i), adv. In a tutorial manner; as a tutor. The Academy, Jan. 31, 1891, p. 102.

tutorism (tū'tor-izm), n. [< tutor + -ism.] The office, state, or duty of a tutor or of tutors; tutorship. North British Rev. [Rare.]

tutorly (tū'tor-li), a. [< tutor + -ly.] Like, befitting, or belonging to a tutor; pedagogic.

The King had great reason to be weary of the Earl, who was grown so infirm, peevish, and forgetful, as also not a little tutorly in his Majesty's affairs.

Roger North, Examen, p. 453. (Davies.)

tutorship (tū'tor-ship), n. [< tutor + -ship.] 1. Guardianship; tutelage.

This young Duke William, the second of that name and seventh Duke of Normandy, being under tutorship, and not of himself to govern the country.

Verstegan, Rest. of Decayed Intelligence (ed. 1628), p. 169.

2. The office of a tutor or instructor.

tutory (tū'tor-i), n. [< tutor + -y.] Tutorship; tutorage; guardianship; instruction.

The guardianship or tutory of a king.

Haldane, Hist. Scotland, an. 1524 (Chron. I.).

Their reciprocal prospective rights of tutory were defeated, and the motto of either tutor or ward put an end to a subsisting guardianship.

Engce. Brit., XX. 687.

tutrice, n. See tutur.

tutrix (tū'triks), n. [< LL. tutrix, fem. of L. tutor, a guardian; see tutor.] A female guardian.

The Jacobites submitted to the queen, as tutrix or regent for the prince of Wales, whom they truly believed she intended to establish on the throne.

Smollett, Hist. Eng., I. vii. § 28.

tutsan (tut'san), n. [Formerly also tutsain; < OF. tutesain, also tutsan, F. tutesaine, < tout (< L. tutus), all, + sain (< L. sanus), sound; see tatal and sane. Cf. altheal.] A species of St. John's-wort, Hypericum Androsaemum, once regarded as a panacea, or particularly as healing to wounds. Also parkleaves. Sometimes extended to the whole genus; by Lindley to the order Hypericece.

The healing Tutsan then, and Plantain for a sore.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xiii. 204.

In concertos the term is applied to passages in which the orchestra is used without the solo instrument. It is also loosely used of any loud concerted passage.

II. a. A concerted movement or passage intended for or performed by all the voices or instruments together, or by most of them; opposed to solo.

They were bent upon a surfeit of music: tutti, finales, choruses, must be performed.

Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 4.

tutti-frutti (tūt'ti-frūt'ti), n. [It.] A confection flavored with or containing different kinds of fruit; specifically, ice-cream so made.

tutty¹ (tut'ti), n.; pl. tutties (-iz). [Also tussy, tusty, and in many other confused forms; partly due to tuzz, tuzzy, q. v., but perhaps in part connected with *tut*³, in sense 'tutl'.] A nosegay; a posy. [Prov. Eng.]

Joan can call by name her cows,
And deck her windows with green boughs;
She can wreathes and tutties make,
And trim with plums a bridal cake.

T. Campion (Aber's Eng. Garner, II. 383).

tutty² (tut'ti), n. [Formerly also tuty, tutie; < ME. tuto, < OF. (and F.) tute = Sp. tutia, atutia = Pg. tulia, < ML. tutia, < Ar. Pers. tūtiya, an oxid of zinc. Cf. tutenag.] Impure zinc protoxide, collected from the chimneys of smelting-furnaces. It is said also to be found native in Persia. In the state of powder tutty is used for polishing, and in medicine to dust irritated surfaces.

Tute (tutia) a medicable stone or dust, said to be the heavier foil of brass, cleaving to the upper sides and tops of brass melting houses; and such ordinary Apothecaries pass away for Tuty; whereas the true Tuty is not heavy, but light, and white like flocks of wool, falling into dust so soon as it is touched; this is bred of the sparkles of brazen furnaces, whereinto stone of the mineral Calamine hath been cast.

Abaut, Glossographia (1679).

Bound to the twyform beast (the gryphon).
Cary, tr. of Dante's Purgatory, xxxii. 95.

twiformed (twi'fōrmd), a. [Also twyformed; < twi + form + -ed.] Having a double form; biform.

The eye of heauen did rowle the house about
Of that felt twi-form'd Archer.

Darica, Scourge of Folly, p. 23. (Darica.)

twig (twig), n. [ME. twig, twygy (pl. twygges, twygges), with shortened vowel, earlier twig, twi (pl. twygges), with long vowel, < AS. twig (pl. twygy) = D. twygy = L.G. twich = OHG. zwig, zwie, MHG. zwie (zwig), zwie, G. zwiege, a twig; perhaps, with a formative -g, orig. -j, < twi, etc., two, with ref. to a forked twig; cf. twissel, a forked twig, from the same source.] 1. A small shoot of a tree or other plant; a small branch; a spray.

Take fernes eke, or saly twygges take Ye may.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

We liken a young child to a greene twygy, which ye may casilie beude eury way ye list.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 205.

Who set the Twigs shall he remember
That is in Haste to sell the Timber?
Prior, Alms, iii.

2. A divining-rod.

The latest revival among old beliefs is that in the divining-rod. "Our liberal shepherds give it a shorter name," and so do our conservative peasants, calling the "rod of Jacob" the twig.
Cornhill Mag., XLVII. 83.

3. In ceram., a thin strip of prepared clay used in modeling a pottery vessel, especially in the imitation basketwork common in Leeds pottery.—To hop the twig. See hop.—To work the twig, to use the divining-rod. Cornhill Mag., XLVII. 83.

twig (twig), v.; pret. and pp. twigged, ppr. twigging. [twig, n.] I. trans. To switch; beat. Hallivell.

II. intrans. To be vigorous or active; be energetic. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

Ewes yearly by twinning rich masters do make;
The lamb of such twimmers for breeders go take:
For twinnings be twiggers, increase for to bring,
Though some for their twyging peccavi may sing.

Tusser, January's Husbandry.

twig (twig), v. t.; pret. and pp. twigged, ppr. twigging. [A var. of twick, unassibilated form of twich; see twick, twich, and cf. tweak.] To twich; jerk. [Scotch.]

Not one kynge hath bene in Englande sens the conquest but they hane twygged hym one way or other, and had theyr false flynges at him. Bp. Bale, Apology, fol. 142.

Let rautin billies twy the string,

An' for another matchkin ring.

Morison, Poems, p. 78. (Jamieson.)

twig (twig), n. [twig, v. Cf. twick, tweak, n.] A twitch; a jerk; a quick, sudden pull. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

twig (twig), v.; pret. and pp. twigged, ppr. twigging. [Prob. < Ir. twigim, I understand, discern, = Gael. twig, understand.] I. trans. 1. To notice; observe narrowly; watch.

Mag. Gentlemen of the Corporation of Garratt—Heel-Tap. Now, twy him; now, mind him; mark how he hawls his muscles about.

Foot, Mayor of Garratt, ii. 2.

The word seems to have got into English through the ugliest kind of jargon, as in the choice morsel of thieves' cant "twig the cull, he's peery": "observe the fellow, he is watching."
Macmillan's Mag. (Imp. Diet.)

2. To comprehend; understand; perceive; discover.

From the sudden erubescence of his pallid, ill-fed cheek,
I twigged at once that he didn't himself know what it meant. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 1st ser., p. 306.

What is that first instantaneous glimpse of some one's meaning which we have when in vulgar phrase we say we twy it?
W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 253.

II. intrans. To understand; see; "catch on."

Don't you twy? T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney, III. ii.

"I twy," said Mick.

Disraeli, Sybil, v. 10.

[Slang in all uses.]

twig-blight (twig'blit), n. See pear-blight, under blight.

twig-borer (twig'bōr'ēr), n. One of numerous small beetles which bore the twigs of trees, as Twig borer, Amphicrus bicaudatus.

a, b, beetle, dorsal and ventral views; c, twig showing entrance; d, twig cut to show burrow.

the ptinid Amphicrus bicaudatus, which infests the grape and the apple in the United States.

twig-bug (twig'bug), n. Same as stick-bug, 1.

twigged (twig'gd), a. [twig + -ed.] Having twigs or small shoots.

twiggen (twig'n), a. [twig + -en.] 1. Made of twigs or osier; wicker.

A large basket or twiggen panier.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xvii. 10.

2. Covered with osier or wicker.

I'll beat the knave into a twiggen bottle.
Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 152.

twiggen-work (twig'n-wōrk), n. Wicker-work.

An Indian dish or potager, made of the bark of a tree, with the sides and rim sewed together after the manner of twiggenwork.
N. Greer, Museum.

twigger (twig'ēr), n. 1. One who or that which is active or energetic. Compare twirl, v. t.

Twinnings be twiggers, increase for to bring.
Tusser, January's Husbandry.

2. A wanton person of either sex.

Now, Benedicite, her mother said;
And hast thou bene already such a twigger?
Pasquil's Night Cap (1612). (Nares.)

The mother of her was a good twigger the whilst.
Middleton, No Wit like a Woman's, iv. 1.

twig-girdler (twig'gēr'dler), n.

A longicorn beetle, Oncideres cingulatus, which girdles twigs of apple, oak, and other trees in the United States, producing a decaying condition of the wood fitting it as food for the larva.

twiggy (twig'gi), a. [twig + -y.] 1. Consisting of or resembling twigs; made of twigs.

Small twygy stalks.
Gerarde, Herball (1599), p. 804.

Oziers . . . are of innumerable kinds, . . . being so much smaller than the Sallows, . . . and requiring constant moisture. It likewise yields more limber and flexible twigs . . . for all wicker and twygy works.
Echyn, Sylva, I. 20.

2. Full of twigs.

They [the black withies] grow the slowest of all the twygy trees.
Echyn, Sylva, I. 20.

twight (twi't), n. An obsolete past participle of twich.
twight, v. An erroneous spelling of twit.
Spenser, F. Q., V. vi. 12.

twig-insect (twig'in sekt), n. Same as stick-bug, 1. Also twig-bug.

"The so-called stick insects," or "walking-twigs," as they are often called — the Phasmide of the naturalist, "these twy insects."
R. Proctor, Nature Studies.

twigless (twig'les), a. [twig + -less.] Lacking twigs.

Unbranching and twigless stems. Nature, XLII. 151.

twig-pruner (twig'prō nēr), n. A longicorn beetle of the genus Elaphidion. The larve of the parallel twig-pruner, E. parallelum, live in the twigs of oak and apple-trees and other forest- and fruit-trees in the northern United States, and pupate in their burrows. The beetles oviposit by preference in the cut ends of twigs, and the larve work into the live wood by boring down the center. See cut under Elaphidion, and compare twi-pruner.

twig-rush (twig'rush), n. A plant of the ex-peraceous genus Cladium, this name as well as the genus name referring to the repeatedly branching cyme of the original species, C. mariscus. This is a tall perennial rush-like plant with long slender leaves toothed on the edges and the keel, found in bogs in most temperate and some tropical regions. It occurs in the western United States, and in the southern if the similar C. flusum (see saw-grass) be included in it. C. mariscoides grows northward in North America. There are in all about 33 species.

Twig girdler (Oncideres cingulatus).
a, beetle; b, point of oviposition; c, girdling of the twig; d, egg.

twigsome (twig'some), a. [< twig¹ + -some.] Abounding in twigs. [Rare.]

The twigsome trees by the way side (which, I suppose, will never grow leafy, for they never did).

Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, vii.

twilight (twi'lit), n. and a. [Formerly also twilght; < ME. twilghe, twilghe = LG. twilicht = G. zwilicht (cf. MHG. zwilichlicht); < twi- + light¹.] 1. n. 1. The light from the sky when the sun is below the horizon at morning and evening. It has generally been agreed by observers in different countries that this light rises in the morning and sets in the evening when the sun is 18° or 19° below the horizon. The former depression is given by Ptolemy, Gemma Frisius, Magini, Kepler, and Gassendi; the value 19° is given by Posidonius and Albaten. Under some circumstances a second twilight appears, separated by an interval of darkness from the first. Twilight is certainly due to reflection from the upper atmosphere, but the phenomenon is somewhat complicated by the zodiacal light.

Twilight, before the day. Bileculum.

Twilight, before the night. Crepusculum.

Prompt, Part. i, p. 505.

Twilight no other thing is, Poets say,

Then the last part of night, and first of day.

Herick, Hesperides, Twilight.

Now came still evening on, and twilight gray

Had in her sober livery all things clad.

Milton, P. L., iv. 598.

2. Hence, any faint light; partial darkness; shade.

Through many a woodland dune,

Through buried paths, where sleepy twilight dreams

The summer time away. Keats, Endymion, ii.

The oak and birch, with mingled shade,

At noontide there a twilight made.

Scott, L. of the L., iii. 26.

3. Figuratively, an indistinct medium of perception; also, a state of faint or hazy mental illumination.

What shall I do? what conduct shall I find

To lead me through this twilight of my mind?

Buckingham, Rehearsal, iii. 2.

In the greatest part of our concernment he has afforded us only the twilight of probability, suitable to our state of mediocrity.

Locke.

We are always inwardly immersed in what Wundt has somewhere called the twilight of our general consciousness.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 620.

II. a. 1. Belonging, pertaining, or peculiar to twilight; seen by twilight; crepuscular, as a bat or moth.

Symphs and shepherds . . .

On old Lycæus, or Cyllene hoar,

Trip no more in twilight ranks.

Milton, Arcades, I. 99.

When twilight dewa are falling soft

Upon the rosy sea.

Moore, When Twilight Dews.

2. Faintly illuminated; shady; dim; obscure; either literally or figuratively.

Some few sparks or flashes of this divine knowledge may possibly be driven out by rational consideration; philosophy may yield some twilight glimmerings thereof.

Burton, Sermons, III. xlv.

Twilight groves and dusky caves.

Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 163.

A twilight conscience lighted thro' a chink.

Tennyson, Harold, iii. 1.

Twilight curve, the boundary of the earth's shadow, which rises in the east after the sun has set and cuts off the twilight glow. Within this arc, which sometimes appears very sharply defined, the atmosphere receives no direct light from the sun, and reflects only the diffuse light that comes from other parts of the sky. As the sun descends, the arc rises to the zenith and then passes over to the western horizon, its arrival at the latter point marking the end of twilight.

twilight (twi'lit), v. t. [< twilight, n. The form of the pp. in the second quotation is irregular.] To illuminate faintly or dimly.

The temple's dim cavernous recesses, faintly starred with mosaic, and twilighted by twinkling altar-lamps.

Howells, Venetian Life, xi.

He was like some one lying in twilight, formless pre-existence.

R. L. Stevenson, Will o' the Mill.

twill¹ (twil), v. t. [Also dial. (Sc.) twel, twell, twal, twal; < LG. trillen, make double, also fork into branches, as a tree; cf. LG. trill, trille, truch, a forked branch, any forked thing; D. treeling = G. trilling = Sw. Dan. trilling, twin; Sw. dial. trilla, produce twins (said of sheep); OHG. zwilich, zwilich, MHG. zwilich, zwilich, G. zwillich, twill (fashioned after L. bilis, having two threads); with formative -l, < twi-, two; see twi-, two, and cf. turn¹.] To weave in a particular way (see twill², n.), producing diagonal ribs in the stuff.

At last she stood complete in her silvery twilled silk, her lace tucker, her coral necklace, and coral ear-drops.

George Eliot, Silas Marner, vi.

twill² (twil), n. [< twill¹, v.] 1. A variety of textile fabric in which the warp-threads do not pass over and under the warp-threads in regular succession, as in common plain weaving, but pass over one and under two, over one and under three, or over one and under eight or ten, according to the kind of twill. The next weft-thread takes a set oblique to the former, throwing up one of the two deposited by the preceding. The effect of this is to produce the appearance of parallel diagonal lines or ribs over the whole surface of the cloth; but the regularity of the parallel lines is broken in various ways in what is termed paned twill. The goods so manufactured are stronger than those made by plain weaving. In twilled cloth the number of heddles used is equal to the number of threads contained in the interval between two intersections of the warp and weft, as when every third thread is to be interwoven three leaves are used, for six threads six leaves, etc. Twills are called, according to the number of leaves employed in the weaving, three-leaf twill, six-leaf twill, etc.

Special duties were charged upon Scotch linens called twill and ticking, on importation into England.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 61.

2. The raised line made by twilling.

A right hand twill is said to appear much bolder if the thread be twisted to the right hand.

A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 99.

Colored twill, a stout cotton material made in all principal colors, and employed for linings of curtains and embroideries. It will not bear washing.—French twill. See French.—Full twills, twilled fabrics of cotton and woolen, usually of plain color.—Herring-bone twill. See herring-bone.—Kirriemuir twill, a fine twilled linen cloth manufactured in Scotland, and often used as a background for embroidery.

twill² (twil), n. [A var. of quill¹; cf. twilt for quilt.] A reed; a quill; a spool to wind yarn on. [Prov. Eng.]

A Twill; a Spool; from Quill. In the South they call it winding of Quills, because anciently, I suppose, they wound the Yarn upon Quills for the Weavers, though now they use Reeds.

Ray, Eng. Words (1691), p. 77.

twill² (twil), v. t. [< twill², n.] To quill; trim with quilling or fluting.

The great fat pincushion lined with pink inside, and twilled like a lady's nightcap.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xvi.

twill³ (twil), prep. and conj. A dialectal variant of til².

twill (twil). A contraction of it will.

twilled (twild), a. [An uncertain word, used only in the following passage. If correctly printed in the original, it may be < twill¹ + -ed², meaning 'ridged, terraced,' or, as commentators say, 'hedged'; or < twill² + -ed², meaning then 'reeded, reedy.' But it is not likely that Shakspeare ever used twill² for quill.] See the etymology.

Thy banks with pioned and twilled brims,

Which spongy April at thy best betrimms.

Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 64.

twilt (twilt), n. [A var. of quilt, as twilt² for quilt¹.] A quilt. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Beils of state, twilts, pands and testers, napery and brodered wark.

Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xxvi.

twin¹ (twin), a. and n. [< ME. twin, twyn, twinn, twynne, < AS. getwin, double (pl. getwinnas, twins) (= Ice. trinnr, trennr, two and two, twin), < twi-, two; see twi-. Cf. twining. See also twine¹.] 1. a. 1. Two; twain.

Forr Crist iss bathe Gold & mann,

Ormston, l. 1361 (Morris and Skeat, I. 52).

A wain that had thair gere wit-in,

That drann was wit oxen twin.

Cursor Mundy, l. 278 (Morris and Skeat, II. 78).

Thou do to gedder x, and ij.

The laghis [laws] twin sail thou finde squa [so].

Holy Rood (ed. Morris), p. 119.

2. Consisting of two separate, closely related, and equal members; twofold; double; specifically, consisting of or forming twins or a pair; as, twin children.

An apple cleft in two is not more twin

Than these two creatures. Shak., T. N., v. 1. 302.

Parrots with twin cherries in their beak.

Comper, Task, i. 38.

3. One, each, or either of two; one of a pair, specifically of two born at a birth: as, a twin brother or sister.

The water up stod, thurgh godes migt,

On twinne half, also a wal up-riht.

Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), I. 3248.

A Boat twin-sister of the crescent-moon!

Wordsworth, Peter Bell.

4. In bot., growing in pairs; didymous.—5. Consisting of two chief parts alike, or nearly alike, and held firmly together: as, a twin bottle; a twin vase. The plural is used in the same sense: as, twin vases.—6. In zool., geminate: applied to spots, punctures, spines, etc., which are close together in pairs, and distant from others. The Twin Brothers or Brethren, Castor and Pollux; the Twins.

These be the Great Twin Brethren

To whom the Dorians pray.

Macaulay, Battle of Lake Regillus, st. 40.

Twin boat, a boat having two hulls, or a double hull. See twin steamer.—Twin cones. See cone.—Twin crystal. See II. 3.—Twin engine. See engine.—Twin graptolites. See Graptolithide.—Twin ocelli, two similar ocellated spots close together and inclosed in a common colored ring.—Twin-screw, a steam-vessel fitted with two propellers on separate shafts, one under each quarter, having right-handed and left-handed twists respectively. Being turned in contrary directions in driving ahead, they counteract each other's tendencies to produce lateral vibration. Also used attributively.

The Rodney, Admiral Fitzroy's flagship, . . . is also in the Admiralty list called a "twin-screw cruiser," as from her great powers of speed she well may be.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 390.

Twin steam-engine, an adaptation of the steam-engine in which two complete engines are associated to perform the same work; a duplex engine.—Twin steamer, a form of steam-vessel occasionally employed in ferries, the deck, etc., being supported on two distinct hulls which are placed some distance asunder, with the paddle-wheels between them.—Twin valve, a form of valve with a double connection, used at the discharge orifice of a pump, and serving the double purpose of supplying water to a steam-boiler and to a line of hose or pipe. E. H. Knight.

Twin Valve, or Double Gate-valve.

II. n. 1. Two; twain; a pair; a couple.

The schark of the schalk schyndered the bones, & schrank thurgh the schyre grece, & scade hit in twynne. Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 425.

Hit is brused, other broken, other hyten in twynne. Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 1047.

I saw the roote in great dislaine

A twynne of forked trees send forth againe.

Spenser, Visions of Bellay, I. 70.

2. One of two; one of a pair or couple linked together by a particular tie or relation; the mate, counterpart, or fellow of another; specifically, one of two creatures produced at a birth: said of the young both of human beings and of beasts.

He was most princely: ever witness for him

Those twins of learning that he raised in you,

Ipswich and Oxford. Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 58.

Time and Place are *twinn*es and vnseparable companions.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 50.

Two were never found

Twins at all points. Couper, Task, iv. 738.

They see no men.

Not ev'n her brother Arac, nor the twins

Her brethren. Tennyson, Princess, i.

3. A compound crystal one part of which is in a reversed position with reference to the other, as if it had been revolved through 180° about an axis (twinning-axis) perpendicular to a plane which is called the twinning-plane, and is usually a fundamental plane of the given crystal. Thus if (fig. 1) one half of the octahedron as indicated is revolved through 180° about a vertical axis,

1. Octahedron, showing position of twinning-plane. 2. Twinned Octahedron, the upper half in reversed position.

the twinned octahedron of fig. 2 results, the twinning-plane being here a face of the octahedron; such twins are common with spinel, and are hence called spinel twins. This is also called a juxtaposition- or contact-twin, in distinction from a penetration-twin, such as is represented in fig. 3, where each crystal is complete and interpenetrates the other. If the molecular reversal is often repeated in the growth of a crystal, a poly-synthetic twin may result, consisting of successive thin layers or lamellae of two sets, alternately in reversed position to each other. This is common among the plagioclase feldspars, and is the cause of the fine striation often observed on a cleavage-surface. (See albite twin and pericline twin, below.) When the angle

3. Penetration-twin (twin).

between the axes of the two parts of the twin crystal is an aliquot part of 360°, repeated twinning may occur (thus, $3 \times 120^\circ$, $4 \times 90^\circ$, $5 \times 72^\circ$, etc., complete the form); the resulting compound crystal may then imitate (mimetic form) a form of higher symmetry than belongs to the single crystal, and hence be a case of pseudosymmetry: for example, the twins of aragonite (which has a prismatic angle not far from 120°) have often the form of a pseudo-hexagonal crystal; the six-rayed stellate twins of cerussite give another common example of a repeated twin. In some cases the imitation is so perfect that the true nature of the form can be determined only by an investigation in polarized light.—Albite twin, a kind of twin common with albite and the other triclinic feldspars, where the twinning-plane is the brachydiagonal plane of the crystal, and the twinning gives a reentrant angle on the basal plane or surface of most perfect cleavage: such twins are usually polysynthetic, and give rise to a series of fine lines seen on the basal cleavage-face.—Baveno twin, a kind of twin crystal of orthoclase feldspar, first noted in crystals from Baveno in Italy. The twinning-plane is a clinodome inclined about 45° to the base, and the twin has nearly the form of a square prism.—Carlsbad twin, a name given to the common twin crystals of orthoclase feldspar often observed in granites, trachytes, and other crystalline rocks, as at Carlsbad in Bohemia. The twinning-axis is here the vertical crystallographic axis, and the twins are commonly of the penetration type.—In twin, a twin, in two; apart.

The kyng depertid his pupill, put hom in twyn,
In batels on his best way for holdyng hym-selwyn.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 1181.

Paragenetic twin, an ordinary twin crystal in which the compound structure may be considered to belong to it from the beginning of its formation; sometimes used in distinction from metagenetic twin, where the molecular reversal seems to have begun after the crystal had reached a certain development; the latter kind is illustrated by the geniculated twins of rutile.—Parasitic twin, in terral. See autosite.—Pericline twin, a twin common with the variety of albite called pericline, also with the other triclinic feldspars, where the twinning-axis is the macrodiagonal axis. Such twins are often polysynthetic, and then give a series of striations on the brachydiagonal plane or surface of second cleavage; the direction of these striations varies with the composition of the feldspar according to a definite law.—Spinel twin. See above, under def. 3.—The Siamese twins. See Siamese.—The Twins, a constellation and sign of the zodiac; Gemini.

When now no more the alternate Twins are fired
And Cancer reddens with the solar blaze,
Short is the doubtful empire of the Night.
Thomson, Summer, l. 43.

twin¹ (twin), v.; pret. and pp. twinned, ppr. twinning. [< twin¹, a.] I. trans. 1. To couple; pair; mate; join intimately or link together: said of two united or of one joined to another.

We were as twinn'd lambs that did frisk i' the sun.
Shak., W. T., i. 2. 67.

In Gemini that noble power is shown That twins their hearts, and doth of two make one.
B. Jonson, Hine and Cry.

True liberty
Is lost, which always with right reason dwells Twinn'd, and from her bath no diuinal being.
Milton, P. L., xii. 85.

2. Specifically, in mineral., to form or unite into a compound or twin crystal by a reversal of the molecular structure according to some definite law.

Occasionally a simple form is twinned with a more complex one, as in chabasite.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 363.

II. intrans. 1. To be coupled or paired; be mated, as one with another; specifically, to be twin-born.

He that is approved in this offence,
Though he had twinn'd with me, both at a birth, Shall lose me.
Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 212.

Were it to plot against the fame, the life
Of one with whom I twinned.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, iii. 3.

2. To bring forth two at a birth.

Ewes yearly by twinning rich masters do make.
Tusser, January's Husbandry, st. 28.

twin² (twin), v. [Also twine; < ME. twinnen, twynnen, lit. go in two (cf. in twain, above). < twin, two: see twin¹. Cf. twine², v.] I. intrans. 1. To be parted in twain; be divided or sundered; come apart.

Ther hit oncez is tached, twyne wil hit neuer.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), i. 2512.

My saule, ihesus, take I to thee
When my body and it sal twyne.
Political Poems (ed. Furnivall), p. 109.

Thy faith and troth thou sall na get,
And our true love shall neuer twyn.
Clerk Saunders (Child's Ballads, II. 50).

2. To part; depart; go away.

Fortune wolde that he moste twyne
Out of that place which that I was inne.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 569.

Loke thou thin herte fro him not twynne.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

3. To be separated (from) or deprived (of): as, to twyn with one's gear. Jamieson. [Scotch.] II. trans. 1. To part in twain; sever; sunder. Hallivell.

There were twenty and too, to twyn hom in sonder.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 2747.

It seith, "Alas! whi twynned be we twyne?"

With borrowed light pursued their narrower way.
Shelley, Queen Mab, ix.

twinkling (twing'kling), n. [< ME. twynkling, twynkelinge; verbal n. of twinkle, v.] 1. The act of one who or that which twinkles; especially, a quick twitching or fluttering movement of the eye; a wink.

Boys in their first bloom, skilled in the dance, . . . smote the good floor with their feet. And Odysseus gazed at the twinklings of the feet, and marvelled in spirit. Butcher and Lang, tr. of Homer's Odyssey, viii. (ed. Macmillan, 1881, p. 123).

2. The phenomenon of scintillation of the fixed stars, consisting of fluctuations of light and of color at the rate of from fifty to a hundred per second. The fluctuations of light did not escape the notice of the ancients; those of color were noticed by Robert Hooke in 1665. The phenomenon was, without any reason at all, generally supposed to have its origin in the eye, until William Nicholson, the chemist, showed in 1813 that, if the image of a twinkling star was stretched out into a ribbon by an irregular movement of the telescope, the fluctuations would appear as variations of light and color along this ribbon. Charles Dufour, in 1856, published the following generalizations of his observations, now known as Dufour's laws: (1) the pale stars twinkle more than the chrome, and the chrome more than the ruddy ones; (2) at different altitudes the twinkling is proportional to the coefficient of astronomical refraction multiplied by the trajectory of the ray; and (3) the twinkling diminishes as the diameter of the star increases. Lorenzo Respighi, in 1863, examined the effect of twinkling upon the spectra of stars. He found that oblique bands of shade pass over the spectrum in different directions according as the star is east or west of the meridian. Finally, Charles Montigny, with a special instrument called a scintillometer, has made extensive observations concerning the differences of the rate of twinkling at different seasons, under different meteorological conditions, and for different stars. It is certain that twinkling is due in some way to the entrance and passage of the light in the atmosphere, but how is not altogether settled. Twinkling is entirely distinct from the "dancing" of stars, which is frequent, especially in winter.

3. The time required for one twinkle or wink, as of the eye; a flash; hence, a very short time.

This world in an iges twynkling
Thou maist distroie, noon may defende.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Fureivall), p. 173.

twyer (twi'er), n. [Also twyer, twyer, twyer, and trier; accom. forms of F. tuyère, a nozzle; cf. tuyau, a pipe; see tucl, tucl.] A tube or pipe through which the blast of air enters a blast-furnace. In blast-furnaces working with cold air this passes direct from the blowing-engine into the "blast-main" or "horseshoe-main" (a circular pipe nearly surrounding the hearth on the outside), and thence through the twyers into the furnace. When the hot blast is used precautions have to be taken to prevent the twyers from melting, and this is done by making them hollow truncated cones through which a supply of water is constantly circulating. In the so-called "scotch twyer," which is also much used, instead of a truncated cone there is a spiral wrought-iron tube inclosed in a cast-iron casing, through which tube water is continually flowing. Copper and phosphor-bronze have also been used for twyers. Also called twie-iron. See cut under smelting-furnace. — Twyer arch. See arch.

Tyche (tí'kē), n. [< Gr. Τύχη, personification of fortune, fortune.] In Gr. myth., the goddess of fortune, a divinity whose protection was believed to assure prosperity, wealth, and good luck: often in the form Agathe Tyche (Good Fortune). Compare apothodemon.

Tychonic (tí-kon'ík), a. [< Tycho (see def.) + -ic.] Pertaining to Tycho Brahe, a famous Danish astronomer (1546–1601), or to his system of astronomy.

The Copernican hypothesis is more probable than the Tychonic.
Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., x.

tycoon (tí-kōn'), n. [Also taikun, taicoun; < Jap. taikun, 'great prince,' < Chinese ta, great, + kun, prince: said to have been coined in 1854 by a preceptor of Iyesada, the shogun, as a fitting title for his master in the treaty which he was then concluding with Commodore Perry. The phrase, however, seems to have been used much earlier, having been applied to Iyemitsu (1623–49), the third of the Tokugawa shoguns, in a letter sent by his government to Korea, in order to impress the "barbarian" Koreans with his greatness.] The title by which the shoguns of Japan were known to foreigners from the signing of the treaty negotiated in 1854 by Commodore Matthew Perry, on behalf of the United States, and Iyesada, the shogun and supposed "temporal emperor" of Japan, to the end of the shogunate in 1868, but never recognized by the Japanese.

The style Tai Kun, Great Prince, was borrowed, in order to convey the idea of sovereignty to foreigners, at the time of the conclusion of the Treaties.

Milford, Tales of Old Japan, p. 5.

tycoonate (tí-kō'nāt), n. [< tycoon + -ate.] The shogunate.

tydet, n. An obsolete spelling of tide.¹

tydyt, n. An obsolete spelling of tidy.²

tye, v. An obsolete or archaic spelling of tie.¹

tye (tí), n. 1. An obsolete or archaic spelling of tie.¹—2. Naut., the part of a topsail-halyard which passes through a block or sheave-hole at the masthead, and is attached to the yard. —Peak-tye. See peak.¹

tye (tí), n. [< Gr. τυρ, v.] In mining, a kind of narrow buddle used with a quick current of water for roughly washing tin or lead ore. [Eng.] tye (tí), v. t.; pret. and pp. tyed, ppr. tying. [Perhaps ult. < AS. theccan, wash: see twice.¹] To wash with the tye, as ore. Compare tyr, n.

tye-block (tí-blok), n. In heavy ships, a block on the topsail-yard through which the tye is rove, the standing part being made fast to the masthead.

tyert, n. An obsolete spelling of tier.¹, tier.⁵

tye-wig, n. A variant of tie-wig.

tyfoont, n. An obsolete spelling of typhoon.

tygt, n. An obsolete spelling of tig.

tygert, n. An obsolete spelling of tiger.

tying (tí'ing), n. [Verbal n. of tie.¹, v.] The act of fastening with a string, rope, or chain; also, a fastening: as, the tyings were of blue silk.

tykt, v. An old spelling of tick.¹

tykel, n. See like.²

tyke, n. An obsolete form of tick.²

tylarus (tí'lá-rus), n.; pl. tylari (tí-lá). [< Gr. τυλος, a knot, knob.] In ornith., one of the Tylenchus (tí-leng'kus), n. [N.L., also Tylenchus (Bastian, 1865). < Gr. τυλος, a knot, knob, + ἵλος, a spear.] A genus of minute parasitic nematoid worms, of the family tylenchidae. Some of them do much damage to crops, as the wheat-worm, T. tritici, which causes the disease called ear-rot, and purples, and T. decastri, the stem-eelworm of clover. Some of these worms were early known as cibrios, and they were formerly placed in the more comprehensive genus Anguillula.

tyler, n. An obsolete or archaic form of tyler.

Tylerism (tí'lér-izm), n. [< Tyler (see def.) + -ism.] 1. A phase of New England Calvinism named from Dr. Bennet Tyler of Connecticut (1783–1858). It reaffirmed the positions of the older Calvinism concerning divine sovereignty, as against the positions of Taylorism. Out of Dr. Tyler's controversy with Dr. Taylor of New Haven grew the theological seminary now at Hartford, Connecticut.

2. In U. S. politics, the methods of President Tyler. See Tylerize.

Tylerize (tí'lér-íz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Tylerized, ppr. Tylerizing. [< Tyler (see def.) + -ize.] In U. S. politics, to follow the example of President Tyler (1841–5), who turned against the Whig party, to which he owed his office; become a renegade to one's party while holding an office conferred by it.

The Democratic party evidently had two ways of returning, or trying to return, to office and power. They might either assail and unseat the Administration, or else persuade the Executive to Tylerize.
The Nation, I. 227.

tyli, n. Plural of tylus.

tyllt, tyllet, prep. Obsolete forms of till.²

tyllett, n. See tillet.²

Tylophora (tí-lof'ó-rá), n. [N.L. (R. Brown, 1808), from the thick fleshy segments of the staminal corona; < Gr. τυλος, a knot, knob, + -φωρος, < φέρω = E. bear.¹] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceae and tribe Marsdenieae. It is characterized by a somewhat wheel-shaped corolla with a corona of five fleshy scales laterally compressed and intorsely adnate to the stamen-tube, and by small globose or ovoid pollen-masses. There are about 40 species, natives of Africa, Asia, and Australasia. They are shrubby or herbaceous twiners, or rarely partially erect; they bear opposite leaves and small cymose flowers. T. (Hoya) barbatá is sometimes cultivated; for T. asthmatica, see Indian ipecac, under ipecac.

tylopod (tí'lō-pod), a. and n. [< Gr. τυλος, a knot, knob, callus, + πους (pod) = E. foot.] 1. a. Having padded instead of hooved digits; having the ends of the digits like pads; of or pertaining to the Tylopoda; phalangigrade, as a camel.

II. n. A member of the Tylopoda, as a camel or llama.

Tylopoda (tí-lop'ó-dá), n. pl. [N.L. (Illiger, 1811), as a family of his Bisulati: see tylopod.] The tylopod or phalangigrade artiodactyl ruminants, represented by one family, the Camelidae. The feet are tylopod; the lower part of the thigh is exerted from the trunk of the body; the lower canines are specialized; the lateral upper incisors are persistent; the stomach is incompletely quadripartite; and the placenta is diffuse. More fully called Pecora tylopoda, and also Phalangigrada.

tylopodous (tí-lop'ó-dus), a. Same as tylopod.
tylosis (tí-lō'sis), n.; pl. tyloses (sēz). [< Gr. τυλος, a knot, knob, callus, + -osis.] 1. In bot., a growth formed in the cavity of a duct by the intrusion of the wall of a contiguous cell through one or more of the perforations of the duct. —2. An affection of the eyelids characterized by an indurated thickening of their edges. —3. Same as leucoplacia. —4. Callosity.

tylostylar (tí-lō'stí-lár), a. [< tylostyle + -ar.] Of or pertaining to a tylostyle; resembling a tylostyle; knobbed at one end and pointed at the other, like a dressing-pin.

tylostyle (tí-lō'stí-l), n. [< Gr. τυλος, a knot, lump, knob, + στυλος, a pillar: see style.²] In sponges, a supporting spicule of cylindrical form, knobbed at one end and pointed at the other.

tylostylus (tí-lō'stí-lus), n.; pl. tylostyli (tí-lí). [N.L.: see tylostyle.] A tylostyle.

Tylosurus (tí-lō'sū-rus), n. [N.L. (Cocco), irreg. < Gr. τυλος, a knot, lump, + οὐρα, a tail.] A genus of garfishes, of the family Belontiidae, differing from Belone in the absence of gill-rakers and vomerine teeth. These gars are comparatively large (3 or 4 feet long) voracious fishes of most seas. The species are numerous, and some of them, as T. longirostris (for marions), are known as bill-fish and needle-fish, from the long sharp jaws. See cut under Belontiidae.

tylotate (tí'lō-lát), a. [< tylo + -ate.] Knobbed at both ends, as a sponge-spicule; having the character of a tylole. Sollas.

tylole (tí'lōt), n. [< Gr. τυλος, verb. adj. of τυλω, make knotty, < τυλος, a knot, knob.] A tylotate sponge-spicule; a simple spicular ray of the monaxon biradiate type, or a rhabdus, knobbed at each end. A tylole knobbed at one end and pointed at the other becomes a tyloleoxea or tylostyle. Sollas.

tyloti, n. Plural of tylole.

tylotic (tí-lō'tík), a. [< tylosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Of or relating to tylosis.

tyloleoxea (tí-lō-tok'sē-ā), n.; pl. tyloleoxeae (tí-lō-tok'sē-ā), n. [< Gr. τυλος, knobbed, + ὄξίς, sharp, keen.] A tylole knobbed at one end and pointed at the other; a tylostyle. Sollas.

tyloleoxeate (tí-lō-tok'sē-āt), a. [< tyloleoxea + -ate.] Knobbed at one end and pointed at the other, as a sponge-spicule of the rhabdus type; having the character of a tyloleoxea. Sollas.

tylotus (tí-lō'tus), n.; pl. tylots (tí-lí). [N.L., < Gr. τυλος, knobbed: see tylole.] A tylole.

tylus (tí'lus), n.; pl. tyli (tí-lí). [N.L., < Gr. τυλος, a knot, knob, lump, protuberance.] In heteropterous insects, a central anterior division of the upper surface of the head, often projecting in front, and separated by depressed lines from the two lateral lobes.

tymbal, n. See timbal.

tymbalant (tím'bal-ant), n. A false form of tymbal.

War-music, bursting out from time to time
With gong and tymbalant's tremendous chime.
Moore, Lalla Rookh, Veiled Prophet.

tym (timp), n. [Shortened from tympan or tympanum.] 1. In the blast-furnace, the crown of the opening in front of the hearth, a little below and in front of which is the dam-stone. The tym is sometimes a masonry arch (the tympan-arch), sometimes a block of refractory stone (the tympan-stone), and sometimes a hollow box or block of iron (the tymplate) through which water is kept constantly circulating, so as to protect it from the heat and the corrosive action of the slag.

2. In coal-mining, a cap or lid; a short piece of timber placed horizontally for supporting the roof. [Eng.] tympan. An abbreviation of tympano or tympani.

tympan (tím'pan), n. [Formerly also timpan, timpane; < F. tympan = Sp. timpano = Pg. timpano, tympano = It. timpano = Fr. Gaël. tiompan = W. tympan, a drum, timbrel, etc.; < L. tympanum, < Gr. τυμπαν, poet. also τυμπαρος, a drum, roller, area of a pediment, panel of a door, etc.; < τυπτα, beat, strike: see type. From the same source are tympanum, timbr, timbre, etc.] 1. A timbrel or drum. Bailey. —2. An ancient Irish musical instrument, the exact nature of which is disputed. Probably it had strings, and was played with a bow, thus resembling the erowl.

It should be remarked that the [Irish] tympan was not a drum, as was formerly supposed, but a stringed instrument, and by the researches of the antiquary O'Curry it is proved to have been played with a bow.

Sir R. P. Stewart, in Grove's Dict. Music, II. 20.

3. A stretched membrane, or a tense sheet of some thin material, as that of a drumhead.

This [carbon] lozenge is pressed gently by a tympan.

Grover, Dict. Electricity, p. 170.

4. In a printing-press having a platen, a framed appliance interposed between the platen and the sheet to be printed, for softening and equalizing the pressure, by means of blankets between its two parts, the outer and the inner tympan. The latter has a frame fitting snugly into that of the former, and both are tightly covered with parchment or strong linen cloth. In a hand-press the tympan is hinged to the outer end of the bed, has the frisket fixed by hinges to its top, receives the sheets to be printed, and completely covers the bed when folded down upon it, the platen, when lowered, fitting into the frame of the inner tympan. See cut under printing-press.

5. In anat., a tympanum. —6. In arch., a tympanum. —Tympan of an arch, a spandrel. (Rare.)

tympana, n. Latin plural of tympanum.

tympanal (tím'pan-ál), a. [< tympanum (um) + -al.] Same as tympanic.

tympani, n. Plural of tympano.

tympanic (tím'pan'ík), a. and n. [< tympanum (um) + -ic.] 1. a. I. Of, pertaining to, or resembling a tympan or tympanum; similar to or acting like a drumhead. —2. In anat., of or pertaining to the tympanum; as, the tympanic cavity.

The "tympanic wing" of the exoccipital [cartilage in birds].
Encyc. Brit., III. 702.

The tympanic sense . . . comes in to help here.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II. 204.

Tympanic artery, a small branch of the internal maxillary artery, which passes through the Glaserian fissure to be distributed to the structures within the tympanum and to the tympanic membrane. Tympanic bone. See II. See also temporal bone, under temporal.² Tympanic cartilage, a gristly prolongation of the cartilage of the outer ear, attached to the circumference of the bony external auditory meatus. Tympanic cavity, the drum of the ear. See tympanum. 2. Tympanic membrane, the drum-membrane of the ear—a membrane stretched across the bottom of the external auditory meatus, separating the cavity of that meatus from that of callous pads or cushions on the under side of the toes. Such balls of the toes are little apparent or non-existent in birds with soft skinny feet, but well marked in most perchers whose toes are horny, and especially prominent in birds of prey.

tyleberry (tí'ber'í), n. The coral-plant, Jatropha multifida. Its seeds have properties like those of the physic-nut (see Jatropha), and it is sometimes called French physic-nut.

the tympanum, and connected with the malleus in a mammal or with the quadrate bone in a bird. It is very superficial in the human infant, where the tympanic bone is merely annular, and in those animals in which this bone is rudimentary or wanting, but it is generally situated at the bottom of a deep tube. See cuts under tympanum and earl.—Tympanic nerve, a branch of the glossopharyngeal, which enters the tympanum through a canal of the temporal bone to supply the mucous membrane of that cavity and of the Eustachian tube. Also called Jacobson's and Anderssen's nerve.—Tympanic notch. See notch.—Tympanic pedicle, the suspensorium of the lower jaw in fishes. See epitympanic.—Tympanic plate, the lamina of bone which forms the anterior wall of the tympanum and external auditory meatus, and the posterior part of the glenoid fossa.—Tympanic plexus. See plexus.—Tympanic resonance.—tympanic resonance (which see, under resonance).—Tympanic ring, an annular tympanic bone or cartilage, to which the tympanic membrane is attached. This bone of the ear may be a permanent complete ring, or may form an incomplete circle. In either case, it may characterize only the embryo or the infant, and grow into a tubular form, or may be inflated as a tympanic bulla, sometimes of enormous dimensions. In man the ring is at first simply annular and incomplete, so that the ossicles of the tympanum are readily seen from the outside of the skull of the infant; it acquires with age a tubular form, and becomes ankylosed with other elements of the temporal bone.

II. n. 1. A bone of the ear of man and mammals, supporting the tympanic membrane, generally annular or tubular, forming most of the meatus auditorius externus, or external auditory passage. Its outer extremity is known in human anatomy as the external auditory process; it is annular at birth, subsequently becoming elongated and cylindric.

2. Below mammals, in animals in which the true tympanic is rudimentary or wanting, the quadrate or pedicellate bone, the representative of the malleus; the suspensorium of the lower jaw, or especially its uppermost piece, the hyomandibular or epitympanic; so called by some who suppose it to be the tympanic bone, from the fact that it in part supports the tympanic membrane. See quadrate, n., 3 (a), hyomandibular, epitympanic, and other compounds of tympanic there cited.—3. In ornith., sometimes, the tympano-occipital, considered as the true representative in birds of the tympanic of a mammal.

tympanichord (tim'pa-ni-kôrd), n. [< NL. tympanum + Gr. χορδή, a string.] That branch of the facial nerve which traverses the tympanum; the so-called chorda tympani. See chorda. Cotes, 1887.

tympanichordal (tim'pa-ni-kôr'dal), a. [< tympanichord + -al.] Of or pertaining to the tympanichord. Cotes.

tympaniform (tim'pa-ni-fôrm), a. [< NL. tympanum + L. forma, form.] Resembling or having the form of a tympanum; stretched like a drumhead; as, a tympaniform membrane. Hurley, Anat. Invert., p. 378.

tympanism (tim'pa-nizm), n. [< Gr. τυμπανον, a drum, + -ism.] In pathol., distention by gas.

tympanist (tim'pa-nist), n. [< Gr. τυμπανον, a drum, + -ist.] One who plays a tympan or drum. [Rare.]

"Why is the Timpan called Timpan Nainh (or saint's Timpan), and yet no saint ever took a Timpan into his hands?" "I do not know," said the tympanist.

O'Curry, Anc. Irish, II. xxi.

Tympanistria (tim'pa-nis'tri-ä), n. [< NL. (Reichenbach, 1852), < Gr. τυμπανιστρια, fem. of τυμπανιστρις, a drummer, < τυμπανον, a drum; see tympanum.] 1. In ornith., a monotypic genus of South African doves. T. buehler, the tambourine, is credited with a peculiar resonance of voice or sort of

2. In entom., a genus of hemipterous insects. Stål, 1861.

tympanites (tim'pa-ni'têz), n. [< NL. < L. tympanites, dropsy of the belly, < Gr. τυμπανίτης, of or pertaining to a drum. < τυμπανον, a drum; see tympanum.] Distention of the abdomen caused by the presence of air either in the intestine or in the cavity of the peritoneum; abdominal tympanism.—Uterine tympanites, tympanism of the womb; phlycten.

tympanitic (tim'pa-ni'tik), a. [< L. tympaniticus, one who is afflicted with tympanites, < tympanites, tympanites; see tympanites.] Pertaining to or of the nature of tympanites.

Since then all he had eaten or drunk or done had down to his stomach, producing a tympanitic action in that organ. H. Kingsley, Ravenshoe, xii.

Tympanitic dullness, the quality of a percussion-note in which the resonance is subnormal and in which the vesicular quality is absent.—Tympanitic resonance. See resonance.

tympanitis (tim'pa-ni'tis), n. [< NL. < tympanum + -itis. Cf. tympanites.] 1. Inflammation of the lining membrane of the tympanum, or middle ear.—2. Incorrectly, tympanites.

tympanize (tim'pa-niz), v. [< Gr. τυμπανίζω, beat the drum, < τυμπανον, a drum; see tympanum.] I. trans. To make into a drum. Oley, Life of G. Herbert (1671), M. 2. b. (Latham). II. intrans. To act the part of a drummer. Coles.

tympano, n. See tympano.

tympano-Eustachian (tim'pa-nô-ê-stā'ki-an), a. Of or pertaining to the tympanum and the Eustachian tube.

tympanohyal (tim'pa-nô-hi'al), n. and a. [< tympanum + hyaloid + -al.] I. n. In zool. and anat., a small cartilage or bone of man and some other mammals, recognizably distinct at an early period, subsequently fused with its surroundings, constituting one of the elements of Visceral Arches of Chondrocranium of Human Fetus at third month, somewhat diagrammatic, enlarged.

1, preoral (palatopterygoid) arch; 2, first postoral (mandibular) arch; 3, second postoral (thyrohyoid) arch. IL, internal pterygoid cartilage; EC, Eustachian cartilage; AL, anterior ligament of malleus; M, malleus; IL, incus; IL, long internal lateral ligament of lower jaw, connecting the malleus with the mandible of which latter co is the cornoid process, ch the condyle, and an the angle; bh, basihyal; th, thyrohyoid; ch, ceratohyal; SH, stylohyoid ligament, suspending the hyoid to SH, stylohyoid, or so-called styloid process of the temporal bone, at the root of which, in line with the incus, is TH, the tympanohyal. (From the Proceedings of the Zoological Society of London, 1864, p. 572.)

the compound temporal bone, and in man situated at the root of the styloid process, in the course of the hyoidian arch.

II. a. Specifying this cartilage or bone.

tympanomalleal (tim'pa-nô-mal'ê-al), a. Pertaining to the tympanic bone and the malleus; specifying a bone in the batrachian skull, later identified as the quadrate. See cuts under Rana and temporomastoid.

tympanomandibular (tim'pa-nô-man-dib'-u-lar), a. Of or pertaining to the tympanum, or tympanic bone, and the mandible, or lower jaw-bone, of some animals, as fishes; specifying one of the visceral arches of the head. See epitympanic, n., and tympanic, n., 2.

tympano-occipital (tim'pa-nô-ok-sip'i-tal), n. In ornith., a small bone, or slight ossification, in relation with the exoccipital bone and the outer ear of a bird, bounding the external orifice of the ear posteriorly, and considered to represent the true tympanic bone of a mammal.

tympanoperiotic (tim'pa-nô-per-i-ot'ik), a. and n. I. a. Including or consisting of a tympanic bone united with the periotic bone proper; used especially with reference to the ear-bone of cetaceans. Hurley, Anat. Vert., p. 345.

II. n. A part of the skull of cetaceans, the so-called ear-bone of those animals, which consists of the periotic bones united with one another and with the tympanic, forming a single specially hard and durable bone readily detached from the rest of the skull.

tympanosquamosal (tim'pa-nô-skwa-mô'sal), n. Common to the tympanic and the squamosal bone, as a suture or ankylosis; as, the Glaserian fissure of man is tympanosquamosal.

tympanous (tim'pa-nus), a. [Formerly also tympanous; < tympan-y + -ous.] Swelled or puffed out; inflated; distended; figuratively, pompous.

His proud tympanous master, swell'd with state-wind. Middleton, Game at Chess, II. 1.

tympanum (tim'pa-num), n.; pl. tympana (-nä), sometimes tympanums (-numz). [< L. tympanum, < Gr. τυμπανον, a drum, roller, area of a pediment, panel of a door; see tympan.] 1. An ancient tambourine or hand-drum, either with a single head like the modern tambourine, or with both front and back covered (the back sometimes swelled out as in a kettle-drum), and beaten either with the hand or with a stick.—2. In anat. and zool.: (a) The ear-drum considered as to its walls, its cavity, and its contents. In man and other mammals the tympanum is the middle ear, a hollow or recess in the Tympanum of Human Ear.—The tympanic cavity, enlarged, is here viewed from the inside: the circular object is the tympanic membrane, or membrane of the ear-drum, upon which rests Mall, the malleus; Inc, the incus; St, the stapes; ab, the horizontal axis about which the malleus and incus turn slightly; MC, cells in the mastoid part of the temporal.

temporal bone, among several of the bones of which the temporal is composed, shut off from the meatus auditorius externus by the tympanic membrane, communicating with the back of the mouth by the Eustachian tube, in relation with the labyrinth, or inner ear, its inner wall forming part of the wall of the latter, and containing the chain of little bones called ossicula auditus, and usually the chorda tympani nerve. It is a part of the passage-way which in the early embryo is uninterrupted between the pharynx and the exterior, and in the adult is occluded only by the membrane of the tympanum. In the dry state of the parts, the bony walls of the human tympanum present several openings: that leading outward through the external auditory meatus; the orifice of the Eustachian tube; the openings of mastoid cells; the fenestra ovalis and fenestra rotunda, respectively the terminations of the scala vestibuli and scala tympani, communicating with the vestibule and cochlea of the inner ear; the iter posterius, by which the chorda tympani nerve enters the tympanum from the aqueduct of Fallopius; the iter anterius, by which the same nerve leaves the tympanum by the canal of Huguier; the canal for the tensor tympani muscle; the Glaserian fissure, between the squamosal and the tympanic bones, for the laxator tympani muscle, tympanic artery, and slender process of the malleus, these last two openings being rifts between component bones of the parts communicating, like the Eustachian tube, with parts outside the temporal bone; and the minute orifice at the apex of the pyramid, for the passage of the stapedius muscle. In animals below mammals, as birds and reptiles, the tympanum contains the columella, when that bone exists, and is the cavity of the external ear when there is no external auditory meatus. Its membrane is often upon the surface of the head, and in some cases is a conspicuous structure of the exterior, as in a frog or toad. This is well shown in the cut under parotid, where the circular formation just in front of the parotid is the tympanum. See also cuts under earl and temporal. (b) The tympanic membrane; the ear-drum, in the restricted sense of that term; so used in physiology and auricular surgery, and in common speech; as, a rupture of the tympanum. See tympanic membrane, under tympanic. (c) In ornith.: (1) The labyrinth at the bottom of the windpipe of the windpipe of sundry birds, as the mergansers and various sea-ducks; a large irregular bony or gristly dilatation of the lower part of the trachea, often involving also more or less of the upper ends of the bronchi. It is chiefly found, or most developed, in the male sex. (2) The naked inflatable air-sac on each side of the neck of certain birds, as grouse, especially the sage-grouse and prairie-hen, in which the ordinary cervical air-cells of birds are inordinately developed and susceptible of great distention. See cut under Cupidonia. (d) In entom., a tympanic membrane, stretched upon a chitinated ring, one surface being directed to the exterior, the other to the interior, in relation with a tracheal vesicle and with nervous ganglia and nervous end-organs in the form of a, side elevation, showing form of curved radial partitions, or buckets; b, front elevation; c, annulus for discharge of water; d, floats by which the wheel is propelled in a running stream; e, buckets; f, supports for journals of the wheel; g, spout or chute for conveying the water lifted.

that its lower edge is just submerged, and is turned by the current (or by other power), the partitions scooping up a quantity of water which, as the wheel revolves, runs back to the axis of the wheel, where it is discharged; or it may discharge at some point of the periphery. While one of the most ancient forms of water-lifting machines, it is still used in drainage-works, though for small lifts it is now superseded by the scoop-wheel. E. H. Knight. (b) A kind of hollow tread-wheel wherein two or more persons walk in order to turn it, and thus give motion to a machine.—5. In bot., a membranous substance stretched across the throat of a moss. Laxator tympani. See taxator. —Membrana tympani, the tympanic membrane, or drum of the ear. See cut in def. 2. —Pyramid of the tympanum. See pyramid. —Tegmen tympani. See tegmen. 4. Tensor tympani. See tensor; and third cut under temporal.

tympany (tim'pa-ni), n.: pl. tympanies (-niz). [Formerly also timpuny; < OF. tympanie = Sp. timpuno = Pg. timpuno = It. timpuno, < Gr. τεμπανια, a kind of dropsy in which the belly is stretched like a drum, < τεμπανον, a drum; see tympan, and cf. tympanites.] 1. A swelling out or inflation; an inflated or puffed-up mass or condition; an inflated, turgidity; bombast; conceit. [Archaic.]

The idle tympanies of a windy brain.

Randolph, Muses' Looking-Glass, iv. 4.

2. In pathol., an inflated or distended condition of the abdomen or peritoneum; tympanites.

She cured her of three tympanies, but the fourth carried her off. Farragur, Beaux' Stratagem, i. 1.

tympany (tim'pa-ni), v. t. [< tympany, n.] To swell or puff up; inflate; dilate; distend.

It likewise proves

More simple truth in their chaste loves

Than greater Ladies, tympany'd

With much more honour, state, and pride.

Heywood, Pelopoia and Alopo (Works, ed. 1874, VI. 297).

tymplate (tim'plät), n. A cast-iron support for a tym-stone, built into the masonry of a furnace. The dam-plate forms a similar facing and support for the dam-stone. Both tymplate (or tymplate) and dam-plate are kept cool by the circulation of water in a hollow coil about them. See tymplate.

tymplate (tim'plät), n. A heavy block of stone which forms the upper part of the front side of the hearth or crucible of a furnace, the lower part being inclosed by the dam-stone. See tymplate.

tyndt, n. A spelling of tindt.

Tyndaridæ (tin-dar'i-dē), n. pl. [L., pl. of Tyndarides, < Gr. Τυνδαρίδης, a descendant of Tyndareus, < Τυνδαρος, Tyndaros, a mythical king of Sparta, husband of Leda, and father of Castor and Pollux.] The male children of Tyndareus—Castor and Pollux; a name applied to the electric discharge commonly known as St. Elmo's fire. See corpusant.

tyne. See tincl, tincl, etc.

Tynwald, Tinewald (tin'wöld), n. [Also Tynwald; a var. of the word which appears in a more original form in the Shetland tingwall, < Icel. thing-völur, the place where a parliament sat, < thing, a parliament, assembly, + völur (= AS. werold), a wood; see thing and wold.] The parliament or legislature of the Isle of Man, consisting of the governor and council, constituting the upper house, and the House of Keys, or lower house. It is independent of the British Parliament, its acts requiring only the assent of the sovereign in council.

tynsenl, n. Same as tinsel.

typ. An abbreviation of typographer or typography.

typacanthid (tip-a-kan'thid), a. [< Gr. τυπος, type, + ἀκανθα, spine, + -ιδ.] Having the usual or typical arrangement of the spines, as a starfish; opposed to autacanthid.

typal (tī'pal), a. [< type + -al.] In biol., of or pertaining to a type; forming or serving as a type; typical. R. Owen.

type (tip), n. [< F. type = Sp. tipo = Pg. typo, tipo = It. tipo = D. type, typus = G. typus = Sw. typ = Dan. type, < L. typus, a figure, image (on a wall), in med. the form, type, or character of a fever, ML. (also tipus) access of fever, fever, a figure, prototype, etc., < Gr. τυπος, a blow, an impress, a mark, also something wrought of metal or stone, a figure, general form or character, the original type or model of a thing, type or form of disease, MGr. a decree, etc.; < τυπτεω, τυπειν (τυπ), strike; cf. Gr. στυγερεω, strike, smite; L. tundere (τυδ), < stud, strike; = G. stossen, strike; see stall.] From the same Gr. source are ult. E. tympan, tympanum, etc.] 1. A distinguishing mark or sign; a classifying stamp or emblem; a mark or an object serving for a symbol or an index, or anything that indicates office, occupation, or character. [Now chiefly technical.]

The faith they have in tennis, and tall stockings.

Short blister'd breeches, and those types of travel.

Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 3. 31.

On the obverse is the leading type of the city where the coin was issued, in relief.

E. V. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. lii.

2. Something that has a representative or symbolical significance; an emblem, or an emblematic instance.

Some of our readers may have seen in India a cloud of crows pecking a sick vulture to death—no bad type of what happens in that country as often as fortune deserts one who has been great and dreaded.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

3. Specifically, a prefiguration; a foreshadowing of, or that which foreshows, some reality to come, which is called the antitype; particularly, in theol., a person, thing, or event in the Old Testament regarded as foreshadowing or betokening a corresponding reality of the new dispensation; a prophetic similitude; as, the paschal lamb is the type of Christ (who is the antitype).

The nature of types is in shadow to describe by dark lines a future substance.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 115.

As he sees his Day at a distance through Types and Shadows, he rejoices in it. Addison, Spectator, No. 369.

4. A characteristic embodiment; a definitive example or standard; an exemplar; a pattern; a model.

For lofty type of honour, through the glances

Of envious dart, is down in dust prostrate.

Spenser, Virgil's Gnat, l. 557.

Tophet thence

And black Gehenna call'd, the type of hell.

Milton, P. L., i. 405.

Aristophanes is beyond question the highest type of pure comedy. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 218.

5. A representative style, mode, or structure; a characteristic assemblage of particulars or qualities.—6. In biol., specifically, a main division of the animal or vegetable kingdom; a sub-kingdom, branch, phylum, or province. Thus, Linnæus divided animals into the six types Crustacea, Echinodermata, Vermes, Arthropoda, Mollusca, and Vertebrata (the protozoans not being treated). The vegetable kingdom is similarly divided into main groups called types of vegetation; and in general, in any department of biology, type is predicable of the structure or morphological character of a division or group of any grade in taxonomy, down to the species itself, as compared with another group of its own grade; as, a family type; a generic type. (See type genus, type species, type specimen, and unity of type, below.) The term has both a concrete or material sense, in its application to actually embodied form, and an ideal sense, as applied to form in the abstract. See archetype, prototype, autotype.

Natural Groups are best described, not by any definition which marks their boundaries, but by a Type which marks their centre. The Type of any natural group is an example which possesses in a marked degree all the leading characters of the class.

Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. p. xxxii.

The whole animal kingdom can be broken up into several large divisions, each of which differs from the rest by a number of special characteristics. The essential character may be recognized in all the subdivisions, and even under great individual variations. This has been called the type. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 64.

7. A model or style that serves as a guide; a general plan or standard for the doing of anything; especially, in the arts, the plan, idea, or conception upon which anything is modeled or according to which any work is executed.—8. A right-angled prism-shaped piece of metal or wood, having for its face a letter or character (usually in high relief), adapted for use in letterpress printing; collectively, the assemblage of the stamped characters used for printing; types in the aggregate. Types of wood are of large size, and are now used only for posting bills. Types for books and newspapers are of founded metal. (See type-metal, matrix, and mold.) In Great Britain the standard height of type is .9166 inch; in the United States it is variable, from .9166 to .9186 inch. French and German types are higher. The features of type are face, counter, stem (thick stroke, or body-mark), hair-line, serif, neck or beard, shoulder, body or shank, pin-mark, nick, foot, groove. (See cut below.) The names of printing-types, given in an increasing scale as to size, are caslon, brilliant, diamond, pearl, agate or size, nonpareil (the type in which this is printed), caslon or minion, minion, brevier (the larger size of type used throughout this dictionary), bourgeois, long primer, small pica, pica, English, tro-line, brevier, great primer, paragon, double, small pica, double pica, double English, double great primer, caslon or tracafalgar, and caslon. All sizes larger than caslon are named by the regular multiples of pica, as five line pica, six line pica. The smaller sizes are or should be graded so that each size will be doubled in its seventh progression. (See point, 11 (b).) The names here given define the dimensions of the bodies only.

a, stem, body-mark, or thick stroke; b, hair-line; c, serif; d, neck; e, shoulder; f, pin-mark; g, groove; h, foot. The part between shoulder and foot is the body or shank.

The faces or styles of types most used are roman and italic, which form the text of all books in English. Antique, gothic, caslon, and black-letter are approved styles for display. The type for headings of entries in this dictionary and for phrase-headings is antique condensed. Ornamental types are too irregular for classification. Of each style many varieties are made, which are usually labeled with a special name. Roman types are broadly divided into two classes, modern and old style. The leading forms of modern roman are caslon, scotch-face, French face, thin face, bold face. Old-style types are reproductions of the styles of early printers: the caslon and the Baskerville (English styles) of the eighteenth century; the French and the Lizeux, of the seventeenth century; and the Basle, or early Italian, of the sixteenth century. The shapes of types as to width are defined by the following names: up to standard is a type of which the lower-case alphabet measures 12 cms or squares of its own body from bourgeois to pica, or more than 12 cms for the smaller sizes (on newspapers the standards for widths of types range from 14 to 17 cms for the alphabet); lean or lean-faced type is a name applied to types slightly below the standard; condensed type is seriously below the standard (see condensed); extra-condensed and elongated are of unusual thinness; fat letter or fat-faced is slightly wider than the standard; expanded is still wider; extended is of unusual breadth. The Roman types for book- and newspaper-work are in three series: capitals or upper-case, A, B, C, D; small capitals, A, B, C, D; lower-case, a, b, c, d, sometimes called small letters, or minuscules. A two-line type is a capital of the face height of two lines of its accompanying text. A double type is the height of two bodies of the size specified by its name. Copper-faced type is type covered on its face only with a thin coat of copper by an electrolytic process. White-faced type or barre-faced type is type uncoated; so called to distinguish it from the coppered, or to specify type that is new and that has never been covered with ink. Nickel-plated type is type plated on its face with nickel. Bistard type is a type with a face too large or too small for its body. Type-high is of the standard height of type. Type high to paper is above the standard of height. High-bodied type is a type with too high shoulders. American type foundries apportion the characters of a font, or complete collection of characters, by weight. In a font of 1,000 pounds there are of roman lower-case 514 pounds; capitals, 86; small capitals, 20; figures, 40; points, 28; spaces, 85; quadrats, 122; fractions, 5; italic lower-case, 73; italic capitals, 23; sundries, 4—total, 1,000 pounds. The numbers of the types of ordinary width in 800 pounds of pica roman are as follows:

type-measure (tip'mezh'ūr), n. Same as type-scale.

type-measurer (tip'mezh'ūr-ēr), n. In printing, a graduated rod on the sides or edges of which the body of each different size of type is marked. In use it is laid alongside a column of matter or proof, to ascertain the number of lines and the number of ems.

type-metal (tip'met'al), n. An alloy of lead with antimony, or with tin and antimony, used to make types for printing. The value of the alloy is considerably increased by the addition of a small amount of tin (from 6 to 8 per cent.). Copper and iron have also been used in small quantity to give greater resistance to the alloy. The proportions of the metals used vary considerably with the quality desired, and in different type-foundries. The metal used in some foundries for small types, from brilliant to brevier, consists of 100 pounds of lead, 40 pounds of antimony, and 20 pounds of tin; while larger types, from bourgeois to pica, are cast from 100 pounds of lead, 30 pounds of antimony, and 15 pounds of tin. Extra hard or copper-alloy metal contains 100 pounds of lead, 44 pounds of antimony, 24 pounds of tin, and 6 per cent. of copper. Electrotype-metal contains 100 pounds of lead, 4 pounds of antimony, and 5 pounds of tin. Stereotype-metal contains 100 pounds of lead, 20 pounds of antimony, and 10 pounds of tin. Soft metal, such as is used for leads and quadrats, contains a very large proportion of lead, and but little tin and antimony.

type-mold (tip'möld), n. See mold, 3.

type-punch (tip'punch), n. See punch, 6.

type-scale (tip'skäl), n. A measuring-rod of stout paper, ivory, or thin brass, which shows the dimensions of the most-used bodies of type. It is used to measure composed types.

type-setter (tip'set'er), n. 1. A composer of types; a compositor.—2. A type-setting machine. See type-setting.

type-setting (tip'set'ing), n. The act or process of setting or combining types in proper order for printing. It is usually done by picking up each type from an exposed case, and arranging the types so collected in a composing-stick in lines of even length.

Type-setting machine, a mechanism intended to quicken the operation of type-setting. In the simpler forms of mechanical type-setters, the types, separately arranged in inclined tubes or channels, are successively dislodged by the pressure of appropriate levers moved by the fingers of the operator on a keyboard. As the types fall, they are collected in a long line, and afterward subdivided in lines of proper length. The Kastenbein and McMillen machines are of this construction. Distribution of types is usually done by a separate machine, of which there are many varieties. In all, each distinct letter or character is provided with its own special nick, which serves the ston casts single types by the pressure of the finger on a keyboard, and arranges the cast types in lines for printing. The first type-setting and type-making machine was planned at London by Dr. Church in 1824. More than fifty varieties of machine type-setters have been invented, but few are in use.

type-wheel (tip'hweł), n. A disk or revolving sector bearing letters in relief on its periphery; used in some adaptations of the telegraph and in some type-writers.

type-write (tip'rit), v. t. and i. To print or reproduce by means of a type-writer; practise type-writing. [Recent.]

type-writer (tip'ri'tēr), n. 1. A machine for mechanical writing, operated by hand, and printing one letter, or combination of letters, at a time, by the impress of type adapted to the purpose. There are now several distinct types of these machines.—2. An operator on a type-writing machine; one who prints characters on paper by means of a type-writer.—Automatic type-writer telegraph. See telegraph.

type-writing (tip'ri'ting), n. The process of printing letter by letter by the use of a type-writer; also, work done by this process.

Typha (ti'fä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700; earlier by Lobel, 1576), < Gr. τύφη, cattail.] A genus of plants, type of the order Typhaceæ. It is distinguished from Sparaganium, the other genus of the family, by its linear anthers, stalked ovary, and dry indehiscent fruit. There are 13 species, natives of fresh-water swamps in both tropical and temperate regions. They are smooth herbs with strong creeping rootstocks from which grow erect unbranched and often tall and robust stems with a submerged base. The leaves are chiefly radical, long and linear, spongy, and at first somewhat fleshy and watery. The monocotyledonous flowers form a cylindrical terminal spadix, the upper part of which is staminate and deciduous; both parts are partly covered in the bud by very perishable thin spatheous bracts. The long-stalked minute fruit is produced in great abundance, over 60,000 to the average spike in the common species; each fruit contains a single seed, and is surrounded near the base by twenty to forty long slender white hairs which expand at maturity, aiding in dispersion by the wind. The plant usually reaches from 5 to 9 feet high; in California T. domingensis sometimes reaches 18 feet, including an inflorescence of 3 feet; in the common T. latifolia the handsome dark rusty-brown fertile part of the spike is usually from 5 to 8 inches long, sometimes 14, and is much used for rustic decoration. The abundant mealy pollen is made into bread in India and New Zealand; it is inflammable, and has been used as a substitute for tinder and for matches. The powdered flowers have been used for pontics, and the farinaceous rootstocks are considered astringent and diuretic in eastern Asia. The long leaves are much used in central New York to make chair-bottoms, and are elsewhere woven into mats and baskets. Three species occur in the United States, of which T. latifolia, with four-grained pollen, and T. angustifolia, with single-grained pollen, are widely distributed throughout the northern parts of both hemispheres; the latter is in the United States more local and largely maritime, and often shows a distinct interval between the male and female divisions of the spike. The other and larger species, T. domingensis, occurs in the West Indies, Mexico, Texas, California, and the Argentine Republic. For T. elephantina, see elephant-grass; for the others, cattail, reed-mace, and recre; and compare marsh-betel and duche-donen. They are also commonly known as flag and as bulrush.

Typhaceæ (ti-fä'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1805), < Typha + -aceæ.] An order of monocotyledonous plants, of the series Nadifloræ. It is characterized by usually monocotyledonous flowers with a perianth of irregular membranous scales or of very slender elongated hairs. It includes about 19 species, belonging to 2 genera, Typha (the type) and Sparaganium (where see ent), both marsh-plants of wide distribution, with unjointed watery stems and long entire alternate leaves which project stiffly out of the water or in a few cases float on its surface. The small crowded flowers contain six or more stamens with elongated filicoid filaments, and a single superior ovary usually with a single cell and a single ovule.

typh-fever (tif'fē-ēr), n. [< typh(us), typh(oid), + fever.] A term proposed to include both typhus and typhoid fevers.

typhinia (ti-fün'i-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. τύφος, smoke, mist; see typhus.] In pathol., relapsing fever. [Rare.]

typhlitic (tif-lit'ik), a. [< typhlitis + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of typhlitis; affected with typhlitis.

typhlitis (tif-lit'is), n. [NL., < Gr. τύφος, blind (with ref. to the cæcum), + -itis.] Inflammation of the cæcum and vermiform appendix.

typhloenteritis (tif-lo-en-tē-ri'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. τύφος, blind, + enteron, intestine, + -itis.] Same as typhlitis.

typhoid (tif'loid), a. [< Gr. τύφος, blind, + oides, form.] Having defective vision, as a blindworm.

typhology (tif-lōl'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. τύφος, blind, + -logia, < λέγω, speak; see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning blindness.

typhlope (tif'lōp), n. [< NL. Typhlops.] A small snake of the family Typhlopidae; a worm-snake or blindworm.

Typhlophthalmi (tif-lōf-thal'mi), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τύφος, blind, + ophthalmos, eye.] In Cope's classification, a superfamily of pleurodont lizards, represented by the Ancylotrupa, Acontulax, and Aniellida.

typhlophthalmic (tif-lōf-thal'mik), a. [< Typhlophthalmi + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Typhlophthalmi.

Typhlopidae (tif-lōp'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Typhlops + -idae.] A family of anguistomatous scolecophidian serpents, typified by the genus Typhlops; the worm-snakes or blindworms. It formerly included all the small serpents with the mouth not distensible and teeth only in one jaw, upper or lower, being the same as Typhlopidae. By the division of these into two families, Catadactyla and Epanodactyla, with lower and with upper teeth only, respectively, the Typhlopidae are restricted to the latter, and contrasted with Stenostomidae.

Typhlopoidea (tif-lō-pōi'dē-jī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. τύφος, blind, + opsis, eye, + -oides, form.] A suborder of Ophidia, containing the small scolecophidian or anguistomatous snakes of the families Typhlopidae and Stenostomatidae, and thus equivalent to Typhlopidae in a broad sense. They differ from all other ophidians in having no transverse bone of the skull, the pterygoid disconnected from the quadrate, the palatines with their long axes transverse and bounding the nasal chame behind, and the ethmoidal forming part of the roof of the mouth.

Typhlops (tif'lōps), n. [NL. (Schneider), < Gr. τύφος, blind, < τύφος, blind, + ὄψ, eye.] The typical genus of Typhlopidae, having the muzzle covered above with rostral and internasal sentes, and one ocular, one preocular, and one nasal plate.

typhlosis (tif-lō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. τύφος, a making blind, blindness, < τύφω, make blind, < τύφος, blind.] Blindness.

typhlosolar (tif-lō-sō'lār), a. [< typhlosole + -ar.] Of the character of or pertaining to a typhlosole. [Microsc. Sci., N. S., XXVII, 565.]

typhlosole (tif'lō-sōl), n. [< Gr. τύφος, blind, + σολή, tube, pipe; see solen.] A thick folding of the intestine of certain annelids, mollusks, etc., formed by the involution of the wall of the intestine along the dorsomedian line, and projecting into the intestinal cavity. [Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 196.]

Typhoëan (ti-fō-ē-an), a. [Also, erroneously, Typhæan, Typhæan, < L. Typhoeus, < Gr. Τυφώ, contr. Τυφός, Typhoeus (see def.); cf. Typhon.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling Typhoeus (or Typhos), a monster of Greek mythology, who tried to conquer the gods, but was overcome by Zeus and buried under Mount Etna. Typhoeus is described as vomiting flame from a hundred mouths, and thus typifying a volcano.

typhoid (ti'foid), a. and n. [= F. typhoïde, < Gr. τύφος, contr. τύφω, delirious, of persons suffering from fever, also of the fever itself, < τύφος, smoke, also stupor arising from fever; see typhus.] 1. Resembling typhus; noting a specific continued fever. Billous typhoid fever. See fever.—Typhoid bacillus, or Eberth's bacillus, a micro-organism found in the intestinal ulcers, and elsewhere in the bodies, of those dying from typhoid fever, and believed to be the cause of this disease.—Typhoid condition or state, a condition occurring sometimes in the course of acute diseases of a depressing type, in which there is marked lowering of all the vital forces, shown by prostration, muttering delirium, carphologia, muscular twitchings, unconscious discharges from the bladder and bowels, a dry, cracked, often blackish tongue, etc. Typhoid fever. See fever.—Typhoid pneumonia. See pneumonia.

II. N. Typhoid fever. See fever.
typhoidal (ti'foid-al), a. [< typhoid + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of typhoid fever; as, typhoidal symptoms.

typhomalarial (ti'fō-mā-lār'i-āl), a. [< typho(id) + malarial.] Involving both typhoid and malarial characters; applied to a disease caused by the combined influence of filth and the malarial poison, or a typhoid fever in which the symptoms are modified by the action of malaria. Whether either of these conditions exists has been a subject of dispute among medical writers.

typhomania (ti-fō-mā-ni-ä), n. [< Gr. τύφος, stupor (see typhus, typhoid), + μανία, madness.]

Cattail (Typha latifolia).
a, the spadix, with male flowers above and female ones below; b, a male flower; c, a female flower.

Thorne Type-setting Machine.

a, distributing cylinder; b, setting cylinder; c, mechanism actuating distributing cylinder; d, driving mechanism actuating type-carrying disk, carrying belt, packer, keyboard, levers, etc.; e, shaft, which transmits the power to all parts extending the distributing cylinder; f, type-carrying disk; g, packer, which lifts the type singly into a continuous line; h, keyboard; i, levers, connecting keyboard with bottom of setting cylinder; j, copy holder; k, justifying mechanism; l, iron case for spaces and hyphens; m, type-bank, containing italics, which are inserted by hand as required; n, case for small caps, in some machines for fractions and other odd characters, to be put in by hand.

same purpose as the nicks or channels in a key for the wards of its lock. When the types are successively presented before outlets with wards, the proper nick finds its proper ward, and is discharged in its proper channel. Some machines combine the two operations of setting and distribution, as the Thorne and Paige machines. The Paige machine adds the operation of automatic justifying, or making its lines of even length. A more complex form of machine dispenses with types and distribution, and makes the types as they are needed. The operator at the keyboard moves levers that assemble the matrices in proper order over a mold, and justifies the words of each line, in a line evenly spaced and of uniform length. The mold is then instantly filled with melted type-metal, which casts all the words in one piece. The Mergenthaler, or linotype, and the Rogers are of this form. The Lan-

A low, muttering delirium with stupor, but without sleep, as seen in severe cases of typhus fever. Also typhoid.

typhoon (ti-fōn), n. [< NL. typhon (Bacon), < Gr. typhon, also typhon, a furious whirlwind; cf. Typhon, Typhon, one of the giants, son of Typhoeus, and Typhon, Typhon, father of Typhon, and a god of the winds; cf. typhon, cloud, smoke, mist, etc.; cf. typhon, smoke; cf. Skt. dhūm, smoke, cf. typhon. The word has been merged in typhoon, q. v.] A whirlwind.

Typhon (ti-fōn), n. [< L. Typhon, < Gr. Typhon, one of the giants; see def. and typhoon.] 1. In Gr. myth., a son of Typhoeus, and the father of the winds; later confused with Typhos or Typhoeus.—2. The Greek name of the Egyptian divinity Set, the personification of the principle of evil.—3. [< E.] A large East Indian heron, Ardea sumatrana.

typhonia (ti-fō-ni-ä), n. [< NL. < Gr. typhon, stupor; see typhus.] Same as typhomania.

typhonic (ti-fō-nik), a. [< typhon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a typhon or typhoon; having the force or character of a typhoon.

typhoon (ti-fōn'), n. [Formerly also tyfoon; altered, in simulation of typhon, from the earlier tufoon (1680), tufoon (1610), tufoon (1567), < Pg. tufo, < Ar. Pers. Hind. tūfān (whence in recent Anglo-Ind. tufan, tufan, tufoan, tufoan), a sudden and violent storm, a tempest, hurricane. The Ar. Pers. Hind. tūfān does not appear to be original in any of those languages, and may have been derived from the Gr. typhon, whence also E. typhon; see typhon.] cf. Chinese tai fang, 'a great wind' (of any kind); ta. tai, great; fang (also given as fang, feng), in Canton fong, wind. The term tai fang, a cyclone, a local name in Formosa, may be from the Chinese tai fang in its general sense. The Chinese names for typhoon are puo fang, lit. 'fierce wind', kin fang, lit. 'cyclone wind' (kin, a furious cyclone, whirlwind, a wind which comes from four sides at once). The Chinese terms have prob. no connection with the Ar. Pers. Hind. word.] A violent hurricane occurring in the China seas and their environs, principally during the months of July, August, September, and October. Typhoons are prolonged cyclonic storms of great intensity, and correspond in every respect to the West Indian hurricanes which occur in the same latitudes in the western hemisphere.

I went aboard of the shippe of Bengala, at which time it was the yeere of Touffon; concerning which Touffon ye are to understand, that in the East Indies often times there are not stormes as in other countreys; but every 10. or 12. yeeres there are such tempestes and stormes that it is a thing incredible, . . . neither do they know certainly what yeere they will come. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 370.

Typhoons are a particular kind of violent storm blowing on the Coast of Tonquin. . . . It comes on three and blows very violent at N. E. twelve hours more or less. . . . When the Wind begins to abate, it dies away suddenly, and falling flat calm it continues so an hour, more or less; then the Wind comes about to the S. W., and it blows and rains as there from thence as it did before at N. E., and as long. Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 230.

typhotoxin (ti-fō-tok'sin), n. [< Gr. typhon, stupor (see typhus), + tox (toxin), poison, + -in.] A toxin (C₇H₁₇NO₅) obtained from cultures of the bacillus of typhoid fever.

typhous (ti-fus), a. [< typhus + -ous.] Of or relating to typhus.

typh-poison (ti-fōi-zōn), n. [< typhus, typh (out), + poison.] Poison or virus which when admitted into the system produces typh-fever, or continued low fevers, as typhus or typhoid.

typhus (ti-fus), n. [= F. typhus = Sp. tifo = It. typho = It. tifo = D. G. typhus = Sw. Dan. tyfus, < NL. typhus, typhus (cf. L. typhus, pride, vanity), < Gr. typhon, smoke, vapor, mist (hence, vanity, conceit), also stupor, esp. stupor arising from fever, < typhon, smoke; see typhon.] A fever accompanied by great prostration, usually delirium, and an eruption of small reddish-purple spots; ship fever; jail fever. Compare typhus fever, under fever. Abdominal typhus fever. See fever. Malignant bilious typhus fever. See fever. Surgical typhus fever, typhoid. Typhus abdominalis, typhoid fever. See fever. Typhus ambulatorius, walking typhoid fever. Typhus carcerum, jail fever. Typhus castrensis, camp fever. See fever. Typhus exanthematicus, typhus fever. Typhus fever. See def. and fever. Typhus gangliaris, typhoid fever. Typhus icterodes, yellow fever. See fever. Typhus petechialis, typhus fever. Typhus recurrens, relapsing fever.

typic (tip'ik), a. [= F. typique = Sp. tipico = Pg. tipico (cf. D. G. typisch = Sw. Dan. typisk), < L. typicus, < Gr. typos, of or pertaining to a type, conformable, typical, < typos, impression, type; see typ.] Constituting or representing a type; typical. [Rare.]

Thou Gracious deign'st to let the fair One view
Her Typic People.

Prior, Second Hymn of Callimachus.

Here's Smith already swearing at my feet
That I'm the typic she. Away with Smith!

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, ix.

Typic fever, a fever that is regular in its attacks, or that follows a particular type; opposed to erratic fever.

typical (tip'i-kal), a. [< L. typicus, < L. typicus, type; see typic and -al.] 1. Having the character of a significant or symbolic type; serving as an index or a symbol of something past, present, or to come; representative; emblematic; illustrative.

The description is, as sorted best to the apprehension of those times, typical and shadowy.

Milton, Church-Government, l. 2.

On the right hand of Popery sat Judaism, represented by an old man embroidered with phylacteries, and distinguished by many typical figures, which I had not skill enough to uniddle. Addison, Tatler, No. 257.

Typical remains of every disposition must continue traceable even to the remotest future.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 329.

2. Constituting or conforming to a type or pattern; representative in kind or quality; serving as a characteristic example of a group or an aggregate; as, a typical animal, plant, species, or genus; a typical building; typical conduct. Also typal. Compare atypical, ctypical, subtypical.

I need hardly name David and Jonathan; yet I cannot pass them by; for theirs is, and will remain, the typical friendship of the world. N. A. Rev., CXXXIX, 455.

3. Of or pertaining to a type or types; significantly characteristic or illustrative; indicative; connotative; as, a typical example or specimen; typical markings, colors, or limbs.—Typical cells, in bot., same as fundamental cells (which see, under fundamental).

typicality (tip-i-kal'i-ti), n. [< typical + -ity.] The fact or state of being typical; existence as a type or symbol; also, adherence to types or standards. [Rare.]

Such men . . . have spurned the empty typicality of the church whenver she has pretended to appease that immortal want [of a really divine righteousness].

H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 222.

typically (tip'i-kal-i), adv. In a typical manner; representatively; symbolically.

Other Levitical lambs took away sin typically, this really. Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 113.

In the Eucharist he [Christ] still is figured . . . more clearly, but yet still but typically, or in figure.

Jer. Taylor, Dissuasive from Popery, II. ii. § 3.

typicalness (tip'i-kal-nes), n. The state of being typical.

typicum (tip'i-kum), n. [< MGr. τυπικον, a book of ritual, an imperial decree, neut. of Gr. τυπικος, of or pertaining to a type; see typic.] In the Gr. Ch., same as directory, I.

Typidentata (ti-pi-den-tā'tā), n. pl. [< NL. < L. typus, type, + dentatus, toothed.] A division of placental mammals, containing all excepting the Edentata.

typification (tip'i-fi-kā'shōn), n. [< typify + -ic-ation.] The act or state of typifying.

typifier (tip'i-fi-ēr), n. [< typify + -er.] One who or that which typifies.

A modern typifier, who deals only in similitudes and correspondences. Warburton, Works, XI. 403.

typify (tip'i-fi), v. t. and pp. typified, ppr. typifying. [< L. typus, type, + facere, make (see -fy).] 1. To represent by an image, form, model, or resemblance; show forth; prefigure.

Our Saviour was typified indeed by the goat that was slain. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

2. To be or constitute a type of; embody the typical characteristics of; exemplify; as, the tiger typifies all the animals of the cat kind.

typist (tip'ist), n. [< type + -ist.] One who uses a type-writer. [Recent.]

typo (ti'pō), n. [Abbr. of typographer.] A compositor. [Colloq.]

typocosmy (ti'pō-kōz-mi), n. [< Gr. typos, type, + kosmos, the world.] A representation of the world; universal terminology. [Rare.]

Books of typocosmy, which have been made since; being nothing but a mass of words of all arts, to give men countenance, that those which use the terms might be thought to understand the art.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Typodontia (ti-pō-don'shiā), n. pl. [< NL. < Gr. typos, type, + odont (odont- = E. tooth), make] In Blyth's edition of Cuvier, an order of placental Mammalia, comprehending the Bimana, Quadrumania, and Carnaria (carnassiers) of Cuvier; one of two orders constituting Blyth's zoöphagous type of mammals. [Not in use.]

typo-etching (ti'pō-ech-ing), n. The process of making a plate for relief printing by etching with acid the parts of the surface of a stone which have not previously been protected. See lithography. Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 704.

typog. An abbreviation of typography or typographer.

typograph (ti'pō- or ti'pō-grāf), n. [< Gr. typos, type, + γραφία, < γραφω, write.] A type-making and type-setting machine. Science, VIII, 252.

typographer (ti-pōg'ra-fēr), n. [< typograph + -er.] 1. One who prints with or from types, or by typographic process.

There is a very ancient edition of this work [Justinian's "Institutes"], without date, place, or typographer. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 381, note.

2. A beetle of the genus Bostrychus, as B. typographicus; so called from the characteristic markings its larva makes on the bark of trees.

typographic (tip-ō- or ti-pō-grāf'ik), a. [= F. typographique = Sp. tipográfica = Pg. typografica = It. tipografico; as typographic + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the art of printing from types, woodcuts, or plates in high relief.—Typographic machine, a machine for impressing a matrix from which a stereotype plate may be cast. It has keys which, as they are depressed, operate types in the order desired. E. H. Knight.—Typographic point. See point, 14 ch.

typographical (tip-ō- or ti-pō-grāf'ik), a. [< typograph + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to typography, or the use or manipulation of types for printing; as, typographical errors.—2*t.* Emblematic; figurative; typical.

typographically (tip-ō- or ti-pō-grāf'ik-i), adv. 1. By means of types; after the manner of type-printers, as opposed to lithographic or copperplate methods.—2*t.* Emblematically; figuratively.

typographer (ti-pōg'ra-fist), n. [< typograph + -ist.] A student of typography; a person concerned with the art or history of printing. Athenaeum, No. 3282, p. 412. [Rare.]

typography (ti-pōg'ra-fi), n. [= F. typographie = Sp. tipografía = Pg. tipografia = It. tipografia = G. typographie = Sw. Dan. typografi, < Gr. typos, impression, type, + γραφία, < γραφω, write.] 1. The art of composing types and printing from them.

Caxton taught us typography about the year 1474. Johnson, Idler, No. 69.

2. In a restricted use, type-work; the branch of printing connected with composition; the preparation of matter in type for use in printing.—3. The general character or appearance of printed matter.—4*t.* Emblematic or hieroglyphic representation. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

tyrant (ti'rānt), n. [Early mod. E. also tyrant, also tyran, tyrann; < ME. tyrant, tyrant, tyrunt, tyrunt, also tyran, tyran, < OF. tyrant (with unorig. -b), tyran, tyran, F. tyran = Pr. tyran = Sp. tyrann = Pg. tyrann = It. tyrann = D. tyran, tyran = G. Sw. tyrann = Dan. tyran, < L. tyrannus, < Gr. tyrannos, lord, master, sovereign, tyrant; root unknown.] 1. In ancient Greece, an irresponsible chief or magistrate with unlimited powers, owing his office primarily to insurrection or usurpation. The first tyrants, so called, were generally the leaders of risings against the oligarchies during the seventh and sixth centuries B. C. They ruled with the popular consent in nearly all the Greek states and colonies at one time or another, transmitting their power to their heirs until democracies or new oligarchies overthrew them. Others raised themselves to the position by direct conquest or conspiracy. The arbitrary government of the tyrants was sometimes beneficent, but more often extremely oppressive and cruel. The typical tyrant in the latter sense of the word was Dionysius the Elder, of Syracuse (406–367 B. C.).

The tyrant of the Chersonese
Was freedom's best and bravest friend:
That tyrant was Miltiades!
Byron, Don Juan, iii. 86 (song).

Person.—2. A wilfully arbitrary monarch or person in authority; a ruler or master who uses his power cruelly or oppressively; any person who treats those bound to him in any way as slaves to his will; an autocratic oppressor.

Let us define a Tyrant, not according to vulgar conceits, but the judgment of Aristotle, and of all Learned Men. He is a Tyrant who regards his own welfare and profit only, and not that of the People.

Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, xii.

A tyrant cannot reign and oppress by his single force; he must really interest, and interest prodigiously, a sufficient number of subordinate tyrants in the duration of his power.

Ances, Works, II. 280.

3. A tyrannical or compulsory influence; something that constrains the will inexorably; an overruling power.

For lordly love is such a Tyranny fell
That where he rules all power he doth expell.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., October.

Thought emancipated itself from expression without becoming its tyrant.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 326.

4. In ornith., a tyrant-flycatcher; one of the Tyrannidae.—Bald tyrant. Same as baldhead. 3.—The Thirty Tyrants, a committee of thirty sympathizers with the oligarchs and with Sparta, who ruled Athens with absolute power 404–403 B. C. They were overthrown by the democracy under Thucydides.

tyrant (ti'rānt), v. [Early mod. E. also tyran; < tyrant, n.] 1. trans. To tyrannize over.

What glorie or what querdon hast thou [Love] found In feeble Ladies tyranny so sore?

Spenser, F. Q., IV. vii. 1.

II. intrans. To play the tyrant; tyrannize; sometimes with indefinite it.

This encouraged the Irish grandees (their O's and Mac's) to rant and tyrant it in their respective seignories.

Faller, Worthies, Buckinghamshire, I. 203.

tyrant-bird (ti'rānt-bērd), n. A tyrant-flycatcher.

tyrant-chat (ti'rānt-chat), n. Some tyrant-flycatcher which resembles or suggests a chat.

tyrant-flycatcher (ti'rānt-ſli'kach-ēr), n. A tyrant-bird; any member of the Tyrannidae.

tyrantly (ti'rānt-li), adv. [< ME. tyrantly; < tyrant + -ly.] In the manner of a tyrant; tyrannically.

He us'd to be tyrantly tribute of Rome,

That tenebfully tynt was in time of myne elders.

Morte Arthur (E. E. T. S.), I. 271.

tyrant (ti'rānt-ri), n. Same as tyranny. Wyclif, 3 Ki. [1 Ki.] vii. 20.

tyrant-shrike (ti'rānt-shrik), n. One of the larger tyrant-flycatchers with a stout bill resembling a shrike's, as any species of the genus Tyrannus proper, like the king-bird or bee-martin. Some of these used to be placed in the genus Lanius, being mistaken for shrikes. See cut under king-bird.

tyrant-wren (ti'rānt-ren), n. One of the smaller tyrant-flycatchers, as a species of Tyrannulus, resembling a wren in some respects. See cut under Tyrannulus.

tyro (ti'rō), n. [Formerly, and prop., tiro; < L. tiro, misspelled tyro, a newly levied soldier, a young soldier.] A beginner in learning anything; one who is employed in learning or who has mastered the rudiments only of any branch of knowledge; a novice.

There stands a structure on a rising hill,
Where tyras take their freedom out to kill.

Garth, Dispensary, iii.

tyrocinium (ti-rō-sin'i-um), n. Same as tyrocin. Gayton. Compare tyrocinium.

tyrocin (ti-rō-sin'i), n. [Prop. tyrocin; < L. tyrocinum, first service or trial, < tiro, a newly levied soldier; see tyro.] The state of being a tyro, beginner, or learner; pupillage; apprenticeship; unskilled effort.

To thee I write my Apotheosis, Mæcenæ, strengthen my Tyrocin.

Tourneur, Trans. Metamorphosis, Ded.

Tyroglyphidæ (ti-rō-gli'fī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Tyroglyphus + -idæ.] A family of acarinate Acarina, typified by the genus Tyroglyphus. They all have eight legs developed, of five joints apiece, chelate mandibles, skeleton composed of sclerites in a soft skin, and two front pairs of legs set below the body. The Tyroglyphidæ are usually parasitic during the curious hypopial stage, although they do not seem to require any nutriment from the host; and some species would appear to be parasitic in the adult stage, as Glyciphagus batanarum. The related families Sarcoptidæ and Myobiidæ are strictly parasitic during every stage of their existence.

Tyroglyphus (ti-rōg'li-fus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1796), < Gr. tyrōs, cheese, + glyphein, carve.] A notable genus of acarids or mites, typical of the family Tyroglyphidæ, having a tarsal claw and a sucker. Those of the subgenus Rhizoglyphus feed upon vegetable products, and comprise Phylloxera-mite (Tyroglyphus phylloxera).

a, dorsal view of female; b, ventral view of female; c, mouth-parts;
d, f, g, h, tarsal appendages; e, ventral tubercles of male.
(All the figures are much enlarged.)

about a dozen species. Those of Tyroglyphus proper feed upon animal products, and include among others the well-known cheese-mites, T. casei and T. longior—the latter feeding also upon farinaceous substances. (See cut under phylloxera.) T. phylloxera preys upon the grape-vine phylloxera; T. catenophagus is a well-known pest in entomological collections.

Tyroloer (ti-rō'ler), n. [< G. Tyroloer, Tiroloer, a Tyroloer, < Tyrol, Tyrol, Tyrol; see Tyroloer.] A native of Tyrol; a Tyroloer. [Rare.]

Tyroloese (ti-rō-lēs' or -lēs'), a. and n. [< Tyrol (G. Tyrol, and improperly Tyrol) + -ese.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Tyrol (often called the Tyrol), an Alpine province forming with Vorarlberg a crownland of the Cisalpine division of Austria-Hungary.

II. n. sing. and pl. A native or the natives of Tyrol.

Tyrolienne (ti-rō-lī-en'), n. [F., fem. of Tyrolen, of or pertaining to Tyrol, < Tyrol, Tyrol.]

A dance of the Tyroloese peasants, or a song or melody suitable for such a dance. The characteristic folk-songs of Tyrol abound in yodels.

tyroline (ti'rō-līn), n. A violet dye produced by treatment of aniline; aniline violet. Ure, Diet., III. 1050.

tyrolite (ti'rō-lit), n. [Also tirolite; < Tyrol + -ite.] A hydrous arseniate of copper, occurring in orthorhombic crystals and in aggregates having a foliated micaceous structure. It is very soft, sectile, and flexible in thin scales, and has a bluish-green color. It is known from a number of localities, but is named from that at Falkenstein in Tyrol.

tyroma (ti-rō'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. tyrōs, cheese.] Falling off of the hair; alopecia.

tyronism (ti'rō-nizm), n. [< tyro(n-) + -ism.] The state of being a tyro. Also tyronism.

tyrosin (ti'rō-sin), n. [Irreg. < Gr. tyrōs, cheese, + -in.] A white crystalline body, odorless, and insoluble in cold water, having the formula C₉H₁₁NO₃. It is an amido-acid, and forms salts with both acids and bases. It is a product of the decomposition of proteins, either by the ferment trypsin, by putrefaction, or by boiling with acids.

tyrosis (ti-rō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. tyrōs, cheese, + -osis.] 1. Same as tyremesis.—2. The curdling of milk.

tyrothrix (ti'rō-thriks), n. [NL., < Gr. tyrōs, cheese, + thrix, hair.] A bacterium found in cheese.

tyrotoxicon (ti-rō-tok'si-kon), n. [NL., < Gr. tyrōs, cheese, + toxikon, poison.] A ptomaine produced in milk or cheese, the cause of the symptoms of poisoning occasionally observed to follow the eating of ice-cream. It is either identical with or closely related to diazobenzol.

Tyrrel's case. See *case*¹.

Tyrrel's fascia. The rectovesical fascia.

Tyrrel's hook. A fine hook used in certain operations on the eye for drawing forward the iris.

Tyrrhene (ti-rēn'), a. [< L. Tyrrhenus, < Gr. Tyrrhēnos, < Tyrrhēnia, the Gr. name of Etruria or Tuscany.] Same as Tyrrhenian.

Tyrrhenian (ti-rē-ni-an), a. and n. [< Tyrrhene + -ian.] 1. a. Etruscan; used poetically, or in connection with subjects having some Greek relation or bearing.—Tyrrhenian Sea, a name still used for that part of the Mediterranean which lies between Tuscany and the mainland southward and the islands of Sardinia and Corsica.

II. n. An Etruscan.

tyrrit, n. An old spelling of tirret.

Tyrtaean (tēr-tē-an), a. [< L. Tyrtæus, < Gr. Tyrtaios, Tyrtaeus (see def.), + -an.] Of or pertaining to Tyrtaeus, a Greek poet of the seventh century B. C., who wrote marching-songs and elegiac exhortations for the Spartans.

tysant, n. A variant of tisane.

Tysonian (ti-sō-ni-an), a. [< Tyson (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to, or named after, the anatomist Tyson; specifying the preputial glands or follicles which secrete the sebaceous substance smegma.

tysonite (ti'son-īt), n. [After S. T. Tyson, the discoverer.] A rare fluorid of the cerium metals, occurring in hexagonal crystals and massive, of a wax-yellow color; found in Colorado.

Tyson's glands. See gland and Tysonian.

tysewt, n. An old spelling of tissue.

tystie (ti'sti), n. The black guillemot, Uria grylle. See cut under guillemot. [Orkney and Shetland.]

tyt, tytet, tyttet, adv. Obsolete spellings of *tith*¹.

tythet, n. and v. An obsolete spelling of *tithe*¹.

tything, n. An obsolete spelling of *tithing*¹.

tythingst, n. An obsolete form of tithings. See tiding.

Tyzack's anchor. See anchor, 1.

tzar, tzarina, etc. See czar, etc.

tzetze, tzetse, n. See tsetse.

Tzigany (tsig'a-ni), n. and a. [Hung. Cigany, Tzigany (cf. It. Zingaro, Zingaro, G. Zigeuner, etc.), Gypsy; see under Gypsy.] 1. n. A Hungarian Gypsy.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Hungarian Gypsies; used in English chiefly with reference to their music.

tzopilotl (tsō'pi-lotl), n. [Mex.] Same as zopilote.

U 1. The twenty-first character and fifth vowel-sign in the English alphabet. The Phœnician alphabet, from which ours comes ultimately (see under A), had no such sign, but ended with T. A sign for the u-sound (that is, for oo, or o, as it is represented in the respellings of this dictionary) was added by the Greeks when they adapted the Phœnician signs to their own use, and was written differently U or V; but the latter finally established itself as the accepted form in Greek usage, while the former became customary in the derived Italian alphabets; so that, considerably later, the Romans were able to import V as a separate and foreign character, to represent the foreign Greek sound υ (= French u, German u or ue), into which the Greek ο had meanwhile become to a great extent altered in pronunciation. The V was also commonly written with its angle rounded, as U; and U and V were for a long time merely different forms of the same sign (like I and J); it is only recently that they have come to be always distinctly held apart, and have different values given them. As W also is a doubled U or V, it appears that our four letters U, V, W, and Y all come from a single sign added by the Greeks at the end of the Phœnician system. The sound originally and properly represented by the character, and still belonging to it in most languages outside of English, is the oo or o sound, as in mood, more, ride, and the like, the closest of the labial vowels, or rounded vowels, as they are often called (see under O); but this value the letter has in English only in exceptional cases. What we call "long u," namely, is this same sound with the semivowel y prefixed, as yoo (yo), and what we call "short u" is the more open of the two shades of neutral vowel-sound. The digraphs ue, eu, and eu also have, as long, the yo-value in the same manner and degree. The y-element in the sound, namely, is not always alike full and undeniable, but varies somewhat, according to the difficulty of slipping it in after a preceding consonant. After a guttural (k, g) or a labial (p, b, m, f, v), as when initial, the utterance is completely yo; but after the tongue-tip letters (t, d, n, th, s, z, l, r) the insertion of y involves a more difficult combination of movements of the tongue, and the element is apt to be slighted, being reduced rather to a bit of t; and in the practice of many speakers, and in certain localities, it is even omitted altogether, so that the yo becomes simple o, now being pronounced noo, lorid loirid, and so on. The difficulty in the way of inserting the y, however, is removed if the preceding syllable has the accent; and hence even those who pronounce penurious say pen'yo, and so in all other like cases. This omission of the y-element is not approved, but is stigmatized as provincial or vulgar, although practised by many educated and careful speakers, and probably becoming more prevalent. It is more generally conformed, and even accepted, after l than after t, d, n, etc., and some standard authorities in England itself now pronounce and teach lo instead of lu; in this dictionary the u is so marked if it occurs after l preceded by another consonant, as in fluid (flu'id). After r, the difficulty of adding the y-sound before a vowel is greater than after any other tongue-tip consonant; hence in this situation the pronunciation of "long u" as o is almost universally accepted and practised. Further, after t, d, s, z, "long u" becomes o when the y-element is as it were absorbed into them, converting them (see the different letters) into ch, j, sh, and zh; nor is the y-element heard when it follows any of these sounds having an independent origin, as in jury, etc. The real short u-sound, or that corresponding to o as long, is in a limited number of words also represented by u, as in bull, put, etc.; also by double o, as in look, foot, etc. What we call "short u" is in the great majority of cases written with u, but also with o, as in son, with oo, as in blood, and with ou, as in youtag, and in the slighted pronunciation of unaccented syllables with almost any vowel. Cases like bury and hury and bug are anomalous and isolated. A u is always written after g, and this u (save in the exceptional cases in which it is silent) has a consonantal value, being pronounced as the semivowel w; and it is so treated sometimes also after other consonants, especially s, as in suave, persuade, anguish. U is silent in many words after g, having only (as in French) the office of preserving the hard sound of the g; thus, guide, plague. Like i and y, u is never doubled.

2. As a symbol: (a) The chemical symbol of uranium. (b) In quaternions, an operational sign which, prefixed to the symbol of a quaternion, denotes the versor of that quaternion. (c) In the theory of heat, a symbol used to denote the energy, or the sum of the increment of heat and the heat consumed. (d) [l. c.] In the calculus, the symbol of a function. (e) [l. c.] In hydrodynamics, used with v and w to denote the rectangular components of the velocity.

uakari, n. Same as saki.

Ubbenite (ub'e-nit), n. [< Ubbhe (Ubben-) (see def.) + -ite.] One of a German sect of moderate Anabaptists, founded in 1534 by one Ubbhe Phillips. The Ubbenites rejected the doctrine of divorce, and differed from the rest of the Anabaptists by denying that the kingdom of Christ is an earthly kingdom, in which the righteous are to exterminate the wicked. (New-decker, in Schaff-Herzog's Relig. Encyc.) Also Ubbonite.

ubeity (ū-bē'i-ti), n. [< ML. ubeita(t)-s. ubeity, < L. ubi, where.] The state of being in a definite place; whereness; ubeity.

uberous (ū'be-rus), a. [< ML. uberousus, fruitful, < L. uber, fruitful, fertile; cf. uber, udder, teat, = E. udder; see udder.] Yielding largely or copiously; fruitful; productive; prolific.

About the fruitful flanks of uberous Kent,

A fat and olive soil.

Middleton (and another), Mayor of Queenborough, ii. 3.

uberty (ū'bēr-ti), n. [*< ME. ubertee, < OF. uberte = Pg. uberidade = It. ubertà, < L. ubertu(t)-s, abundance, fruitfulness, < ubi, fruitful; see ubrous.] Fertility; productiveness; fruitfulness; abundant yield.

And take not hem [vines] that here a grape or two,

But hem that kneelth down for uberte.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 64.

ubication (ū-bi-kā'shon), n. [= Sp. ubicacion = Pg. ubicação, < L. ubi, where (prob. for cubi, quobi, < qui, who, quid, what, + -bi, a locative suffix.)] 1. Situation; position; local relation; place of rest or lodgment. [Rare.]—2. Ubeity; whereness.

Among other solutions, he suggests that the board affects the upper weight, which it does not touch, by determining its ubication or whereness. Whereell.

ubiety (ū-bi'e-ti), n. [< NL. ubieta(t)-s (replacing the mediaeval ubica(t)-s), ubeity, < L. ubi, where.] 1. The state of being in a definite place; ubeity. Ubiety is generally said to be either repetitive, circumscriptive, or definitive; but these terms are taken in different senses by different authors. According to the best usage, repetitive ubiety is that of a body which excludes other bodies from its place by its absolute impenetrability; circumscriptive ubiety is that of any extended image which is in a place part by part without excluding other objects; definitive ubiety is connection with a portion of space, all in every part, and not part by part.

Ubiety. Local relation; whereness. Johnson.

If my ubity did not so nearly resemble ubiety, that in Anywhereness and Everywhereness I know where I am. Southey, The Doctor, eccl. (Darvies).

2. Ubiety; omnipresence.

ubiquarian (ū-bi-kwā'ri-an), a. and n. [< L. ubique, everywhere (see ubiquity), + -arian.] 1. a. Existing everywhere; ubiquitary; ubiquitous. [Rare.]

Have ye, ye sage intendants of the whole,

A ubiquarian presence and control?

Cooper, Tirocinium, l. 266.

II. n. [cap.] Same as Ubiquitarian, 2.

ubiquist (ū'bi-kwist), n. [= F. ubiquiste = Sp. Pg. ubiquista, < L. ubique, everywhere, + -ist.] Same as ubiquitarian.

ubiquitair (ū-bik-wi-tā'r), a. [< F. ubiquitaire; see ubiquitary.] Ubiquitary. Hawell, Letters, l. vi. 13.

ubiquitarian (ū-bik-wi-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [< ubiquitary + -an.] 1. n. 1. One who exists everywhere. Sailey, 1727.—2. [cap.] One who holds to the omnipresence of the body of Christ. The name of Ubiquitarians is commonly given to those among the Lutherans who held the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's body, maintaining it as an explanation of the real presence of his body in the eucharist. Their opponents regarded this view as denying a special sacramental presence and as confounding the two natures of Christ. For the latter reason the name is sometimes given to the Monophysites. Also Ubiquarian, Ubiquist.

II. a. 1. Omnipresent; existing everywhere.—2. [cap.] Belonging or pertaining to the Ubiquitarians: as, Ubiquitarian doctrines or arguments.

Ubiquitarianism (ū-bik-wi-tā'ri-an-izm), n. [< Ubiquitarian + -ism.] The doctrines of the Ubiquitarians. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 75.

ubiquitariness (ū-bik'wi-tā'ri-nes), n. The state of being ubiquitary; existence everywhere. Fuller, Ch. Hist., X. i. § 31.

ubiquitary (ū-bik'wi-tā'ri), a. and n. [= F. ubiquitaire = Sp. ubicuario = Pg. ubiquitario, n.; as ubiquit-y + -ary.] 1. a. Being everywhere or in all places; ubiquitous.

She can conjure,

And I am her ubiquitary spirit.

Massinger, Emperor of the East, i. 2.

The ubiquitary and omnipresent essence of God.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 35.

II. n.; pl. ubiquitaries (-riz). 1. One who is or exists everywhere.

There is a nymph too of a most curious and elaborate strain, light, all motion, an ubiquitary, she is everywhere. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

2. [cap.] A Ubiquitarian.

God is so omnipresent as that the Ubiquitary will needs have the body of God everywhere. Donne, Sermons, vii.

Ubiquitism (ū-bik'wi-tizm), n. [< ubiquit-y + -ism.] The doctrines of the Ubiquitarians.

Ubiquitist (ū-bik'wi-tist), n. [< ubiquit-y + -ist.] Same as Ubiquitarian, 2.

ubiquitous (ū-bik'wi-tus), a. [< ubiquit-y + -ous.] Being or existing everywhere; actually or apparently omnipresent; often used in an exaggerated or humorous sense.

Whoever travelled from Brussels to Madrid in order to escape the influence of the ubiquitous Cardinal was sure to be confronted with him in the inmost recesses of the King's cabinet as soon as he was admitted to an audience. Motley, Dutch Republic, l. 423.

ubiquitously (ū-bik'wi-tus-li), adv. In a ubiquitous manner; in a manner involving real or apparent omnipresence.

ubiquitousness (ū-bik'wi-tus-nes), n. The state or character of being ubiquitous.

ubiquity (ū-bik'wi-ti), n. [< OF. ubiquite, F. ubiquite = Sp. ubicuidad = Pg. ubiquidade, < L. ubique, everywhere, < ubi, where; see ubication.] 1. Omnipresence, or a capacity of being in an indefinite number of places at the same time, not strictly amounting to omnipresence; as, the ubiquity of Christ's body; the ubiquity of the king (see below).

This is the consolation of all good men, unto whom his ubiquity affordeth continual comfort and security.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 2.

2. The doctrines or beliefs of the Ubiquitarians.

No one sequel urged by the apostles against the Galatians, for joining circumcision with Christ, but may be as well enforced against the Lutherans holding ubiquity. I. Walton, Hooker.

3. Locality; neighborhood; whereabouts.

Pem she hight,

A solemn wight

As you should meet

In any street

In that ubiquity.

B. Jonson, Love's Welcome at Welbeck.

Ubiquity of the king, in law. See the quotation.

A consequence of this prerogative is the legal ubiquity of the king. His majesty, in the eye of the law, is always present in all his courts, though he cannot personally distribute justice. His judges are the mirrors by which the king's image is reflected. It is the regal office, and not the royal person, that is always present in court, always ready to undertake prosecutions, or pronounce judgment, for the benefit and protection of the subject. And from this ubiquity it follows that the king can never be non-suit; for a nonsuit is the desertion of a suit or action by the non-appearance of the plaintiff in court. For the same reason, also, in the forms of legal proceedings, the king is not said to appear by his attorney, as other men do; for in contemplation of law he is always present in court. Blackstone, Com., l. vii.

ubi supra (ū'bi sū'p'ri), [L. ubi, where; supra, above; see supra-.] In the place above mentioned; marking reference to some passage or page before named.

U-bolt (ū'bōlt), n. A bar of iron bent into the form of the letter U, fitted with a screw and nut at each end. It is used in car-building to form carriers and supports for brake-rods, chains, and other connections.

u. c. An abbreviation of Italian una corda, on one string.

by the silkworm, the eggs hatching and the larvæ developing within the body of the latter, instead of, as is usual with tachinidæ, laying its eggs upon the body of the worm. See Leskia.

U. K. An abbreviation of United Kingdom (of Great Britain and Ireland).

ukase (û-kas'), n. [= F. ukase, oukase = Sp. ucase = Pg. ucase = G. ukas, < Russ. ukazh, an ordinance, edict; cf. ukazivati, glazati, show, indicate, order, prescribe, < g + kazati, show.]

1. An edict or order, legislative or administrative, emanating from the Russian government. Ukases have the force of laws till they are annulled by subsequent decisions. A collection of the ukases issued at different periods, made by order of the emperor Nicholas, and supplemented since year by year, constitutes the legal code of the Russian empire.

In former times, cruel punishments with whips used to be obtained in episcopal circulars as well as in Imperial ukases. A. J. C. Hare, Russia, 1.

Hence—2. Any official proclamation.

Lord Canning is probably not nearly as enthusiastic with respect to the effect of the Proclamation as he was last March, when he issued his famous ukase to the landlords of Oude. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 280.

ulan, n. See uklan.

ulcer (ul'sér), n. [= F. ulcère = Sp. Pg. ulcera = It. ulcera, ulcere, ulcero, < L. ulcus (ulcer), also hulcus (hulcer), a sore, ulcer, = Gr. ûkos, a wound, sore, ulcer.] 1. A sore in any of the soft parts of the body, open either to the surface or to some natural cavity, and attended with a secretion of pus or some kind of discharge; a solution of continuity of the skin of the body, or of the investing tissue of any natural cavity, the result of morbid action, not of mechanical injury nor of a healthy reparative process. A wound may become an ulcer, but is not such unless diseased action is set up. An abscess is an ulceration within the tissue of a part which has formed a morbid excavation with a contracted orifice or none. Ulcers have been divided into local and constitutional, but the distinction is not obvious. They are also treated as simple or specific sores. Most ulcers are both constitutional and specific—that is, the local exhibition of a specific poison which infects the whole system, as the diphtheritic, the syphilitic, or the carcinomatous; others are less obviously specific, as the scrofulous or the scorbutic.

2. Hence, figuratively, a sore, blot, stain, or cause of reproach, in an ethical sense: as, an ulcer of the body politic.

To feed the living ulcer of a corroding memory.

Burke, Rev. in France.

Aden or Aleppo ulcer, a cutaneous affection occurring in the East, which, beginning as a small red papule, grows, suppurates, and finally ulcerates. The etiology is obscure, and apparently there has been great freedom in the application of the name to skin-diseases of this type when occurring in the East. There seems to be no essential difference in the meaning of the following terms: Delhi boil, Aleppo boil, Aleppo gail, Biskra button, Pend-jeh ulcer, Delhi sore, Oriental sore, Persian ulcer, and many others qualified by the name of some Eastern town or country. They are all classed under the one name endemic ulcer.—Perforating ulcer of the foot. See perforating.—Varicose ulcer. See varicose.—Warty ulcer. See warty.

ulcer (ul'sér), v. i. and t. [OF. ulcerer, F. ulcérer = Sp. Pg. ulcerar = It. ulcerare, < L. ulcerare, make sore, < ulcus (ulcer), a sore, ulcer; see ulcer, n.] To ulcerate. Faller, Italy and Profane State, V. vi. 3. [Rare.]

ulcerable (ul'sér-ə-bl), a. [OF. ulcer + -able.] Capable of becoming ulcerated.

ulcerate (ul'sér-āt), v.; pret. and pp. ulcerated, ppr. ulcerating. [L. ulceratus, pp. of ulcerare, make sore; see ulcer, v.] 1. Intrans. To form an ulcer or ulcers; become converted into an ulcer.

II. trans. To affect with, or as with, an ulcer or ulcers.

Some depend upon the intemperament of the part ulcerated; others upon the continual afflux of the lacerative humours. Harvey, Consumptions.

His heart was ulcerated with hatred.

Macauley, Frederic the Great.

Ulcerated tooth, a popular term for purulent inflammation of the gums about a decayed, dead, or loose tooth.

ulceration (ul'sér-ā-shun), n. [OF. ulceration, F. ulcération = Sp. ulceración = Pg. ulceração = It. ulcerazione, < L. ulceratio (n.), a breaking out into sores, < ulcerare, pp. ulceratus, make sore; see ulcer, ulcerate, v.] 1. The formation of an ulcer.—2. The result of such formation; an ulcer.

ulcerative (ul'sér-ā-tiv), a. [OF. ulceratif, F. ulcératif = Pr. ulceratiu = Sp. It. ulcerativo; as ulcerate + -ive.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of an ulcer or ulcers.—2. Causing or producing ulcers. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxiii. 2.

ulceratory (ul'sér-ā-tō-ri), a. [OF. ulcerate + -ory.] Ulcerative.

ulcered (ul'sér-d), a. [OF. ulcer + -ed.] Having become an ulcer; affected with an ulcer; ulcerated.

ulcerous (ul'sér-us), a. [OF. ulcerous, F. ulcéreux = Sp. Pg. It. ulceroso, < L. ulcerosus, full of sores, < ulcus (ulcer), a sore; see ulcer.]

1. Pertaining to or of the nature of an ulcer or ulcers.

She whom the spital-house and ulcerous sores Would cast the gorge at. Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 39.

2. Exhibiting ulceration; affected with an ulcer or ulcers.

Strangely-visited people,

All swollen and ulcerous. Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 151.

Ulcerous stomatitis. See stomatitis.

ulcerously (ul'sér-us-lî), adv. In an ulcerous manner.

ulcerousness (ul'sér-us-nes), n. The state of being ulcerous.

ulcuscle (ul'kus-l), n. [L. ulcusculum, dim. of ulcus (ulcer), a sore; see ulcer.] Same as ulcusculum.

ulcusculum (ul'kus-kûl), n. [L. ulcusculum; see ulcuscle.] A small ulcer.

ule (û'le), n. [Mex. ule, hule, eaoutchoue.] The ule-tree.

-ule. [F. -ule = Sp. Pg. -ulo = It. -ulo, -ulo, < L. -ulus, m., -ula, f., -ulum, n., a dim. termination. Cf. -ule, -ele.] A diminutive termination in many words from the Latin, as in capsule, glandule, globule, nodule, etc. It often appears unrecognized as -le, as in circle, scriptule, etc., and in the original Latin form -ulus in calculus, anulus, etc. It also appears in the compound terminations -ule, -ele (which see). It is much used in the formation of new terms in zoology and botany.

ulema (û'le-mā), n. [= F. uléma, ouléma = Sp. ulema, < Ar. ûlēmā, pl. of ûlīm, learned, one who knows, < ûlama, know; see alma.] The Moslem doctors of sacred law and theological science, especially those belonging to the religious hierarchy of the Turkish empire, with the Sheik ul Islam at their head: a collective term.

ule-tree (û'le-trê), n. A Mexican tree, Castilleja elastica, from the milky juice of which caoutchouc is obtained. See cut under Castilleja.

Ulex (û'leks), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), < L. ulex, a shrub resembling rosemary; according to some, furze, or perhaps Anthyllis Hermanulæ.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Genisteæ and subtribe Cytiseæ; the furze. It is distinguished from the related genus Cytisus by its deeply two-lipped membranous and colored calyx. It includes about 10 or 12 species, natives of western Europe or northwestern Africa—one species, U. nanus, extending east nearly to Nice; and another, U. Europæus, perhaps to Tuscany. They are spiny shrubs without genuine leaves, the leaves being reduced to a spine, petiole, or scale. The yellow flowers are solitary or racemose at the ends of the branches. For Ulex genistoides (Stauracanthus apyllus), see cross-spine. U. Europæus, which also extends to the Azores and Canary Islands, and occurs naturalized on high mountains in Jamaica, is the common furze, gorse, or whin of Great Britain. See furze.

ulexine (û'lek-sin), n. [Ulex + -ine.] An alkaloid prepared from Ulex Europæus, the common gorse or furze. It has been employed as a diuretic in cases of dropsy due to heart-disease.

ulxite (û'lek-sit), n. [Named after G. L. Ulex, a German chemist.] A hydrous borate of calcium and sodium, occurring in loose rounded masses with fibrous structure and white color. Also called boronatrocalcite, natroborecalcite.

uliginose (û-lîj'i-nôs), a. [ME. uliginose, < L. uliginosus; see uliginous.] 1. Moist; muddy; uliginous. Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 180.—2. In nat. hist., living or growing in the mud or in muddy places. Also uliginose.

uliginous (û-lîj'i-nus), a. [F. uliginéux = It. uliginoso, < L. uliginosus, full of moisture, damp, < uligo, moisture, marshiness, for ulidgo*, < uere, be wet or damp; see humid. Cf. uliginosus.] Muddy; oozy; slimy. Woodward.

ullage (ul'āj), n. [OF. ullage, ullage, "the filling up of leaky wine vessels" (Cotgrave), < uller, culler, aullier, "fill up wine vessels that have leaked" (Cotgrave), fill, fit to the 'eye' or bung, < oil, eye, < L. oculus, eye; see ocular, eyelid. According to Skeat, the OF. verb is prob. < OF. curc, ora, border, brim, < L. ora, brim; see orle.] In com., the wantage of a cask, or the estimated measure of the empty part of a cask of liquor.

ullet (ul'et), n. [A dial. form of orlet.] A howlet or hooot-owl; specifically, the tawny, brown, or wood owl, Strix (or Syrnium) ulua.

Ullmannia (ul-man'i-ā), n. [NL, named after J. C. Ullmann, a German mineralogist and statesman (1771-1821).] The name given by Göppert (in 1850) to a fossil plant previously considered to belong to the Alga, but now placed among the conifers. Only leaves and stems of this plant, found chiefly in the Permian, are as yet known, which is placed by Schenk, together with Walchia and Taxiophyllum, in the family Waldieciæ.

ullmannite (ul'man-it), n. [Named after J. C. Ullmann; see Ullmannia.] A sulphid of nickel and antimony, part of the latter being frequently replaced by arsenic. It generally occurs massive with a granular structure, and is of a gray color with a metallic luster.

Ulloa's circle. See circle of Ulloa, under circle.
Ulmaceæ (ul-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Mirbel, 1815), < Ulmus + -acæ.] A former order of plants, the elm family, consisting of the two tribes Ulmææ and Celtidææ, both now classed under the order Urticaceæ.

ulmaceous (ul-mā'shius), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the Ulmaceæ.

Ulmææ (ul'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1847), < Ulmus + -ææ.] A tribe of trees, the elm tribe, of the order Urticaceæ. It is characterized by erect anthers, two stigmatose style-branches, a straight embryo with broad cotyledons, flower-buds produced on leafless yearly branches, and a compressed fruit with oblique apex, commonly a dry samara. The tribe includes, besides the type genus Ulmus, three monotypic genera—two of India and Brazil, and one, Planera, native in the United States.

ulmic (ul'mik), a. [L. ulmus, elm, + -ic.] Noting an acid found in earth-mold, a product of the decay of vegetable matter. See ulmin.

ulmin (ul'min), n. [L. ulmus, elm, + -in.] 1. A name given to various substances which are present in vegetable mold, peat, etc.

The name has also been applied to a dark-brown substance which exudes from the elm, oak, and various other trees. It has also been called humus, humine, gum. See humus.

2. A brown substance produced by the action of strong acids or alkalis on various organic bodies, especially by heating treacle or alcohol with strong sulphuric acid, thoroughly washing the residue with water, then triturating it with gum, and drying the mixture.

ulmo (ul'mō), n. A rosaceous tree of Chili: same as mauro.

ulmosus (ul'mus), a. [L. ulmus, elm, + -ous.] In chem., noting a group of brown or black substances in which ulmin or ulmic acid is present, occurring in vegetable mold, peat, etc.; humous.

Ulmus (ul'mus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. ulmus, elm; see elm.] A genus of trees, the elms, type of the tribe Ulmææ in the order Urticaceæ. It is characterized by a stalked fruit surrounded with a broad wing, and containing flat cotyledons. There are about 16 species, widely scattered through the north temperate regions, extending in Asia to mountains within the tropics. They bear alternate serrate two-ranked feather-veined leaves on slender and often recurving branches which form a graceful flat spray. The flower-clusters contain numerous small apetalous flowers, almost all perfect or mainly staminate, in 1 North American species preceding the leaves, and followed by disk-like notched and veiny samaras, which fall as the leaves expand. (See cut under samaras.) Several other species are evergreen and late-flowering, as U. parviflorus of China and Japan. Five species occur in the United States (for which see elm, slippery elm, rock-elm, and weebow). Three species occur in Europe, all of them extending into Asia—U. campestris, the common Old World elm (see cut under elm), parent of very numerous cultivated varieties; U. effusa (U. pedunculata), the water-elm of central Europe; and U. montana, the wych-elm, the only one thought to be native to Great Britain. U. Americana, U. effusa, and also U. Wallichiana, the Hima-layan elm, sometimes reach a very large size, from 50 to 100 feet high, and 7 to 8 feet in diameter. U. pumila, the dwarf elm of Siberia, a very low shrub, forms the other extreme of the genus. U. effusa, the common village elm of Prussia, is peculiar in forming sharp ribs about its base in old age, which serve as natural buttresses.

ulna (ul'nä), n.: pl. ulnae (-nē). [NL., < L. ulna = Gr. ὑλῆ, elbow; see ulv.] 1. The inner one of the two bones of the forearm, between the elbow and the wrist, the other being the radius; the bone which makes a strict hinge-joint at the elbow with the humerus, and about which the radius revolves in pronation and supination, when the ulna reaches to the wrist and these movements are practicable. The ulna is commonly the smaller one of the two bones, especially below, where its end is little more than a pivot for rotation of the wrist, the hand being almost entirely borne upon the end of the radius. In many animals the ulna is reduced by shortening, and in some it appears merely as a process of the radius, ankylous upon the proximal end of the latter, as in bats, and in hoofed quadrupeds generally. In man, in animals generally which use their forepaws as hands, and in birds it is perfect, and extends the whole length of the forearm. Its proximal end has a large sigmoid cavity for articulation with the humerus, often a lesser sigmoid cavity for the head of the radius, and a prominent process, the olecranon, or head of the ulna, forming the greatest convexity of the back of the elbow. See cuts under carpus, Catarrhina, Elephantine, forearm, pinion, Phossiaurus, and shoulder.

2. In cutum, the stigmatic or marginal vein of the fore wing. Walker; Haldane.—3. A unit of length; a cubit; an ell.—4. In ichth., the hypopercoracoid. Owen.—Oblique line (or ridge) of the ulna. See oblique.—Tubercle of the ulna. See tubercle. ulnad (ul'nad), adv. [ulna + -ad.] Toward or in the direction of the ulna; toward the ulnar aspect of the forearm.

ulnager (ul'näj), n. Same as ulnager.

ulnager (ul'näj-är), n. Same as ulnager.

ulnar (ul'när), a. [ulna, ulnaris, < L. ulna, ulna; see ulna.] 1. Of or pertaining to the ulna.—2. Of or pertaining to that side of the fore limb upon which the ulna is situated; as, the ulnar border of the forearm; the ulnar bone of the wrist (see ulnare); opposed to radial.—Anterior ulnar vein. See vein.—Common ulnar vein. See vein.—Ulnar artery, the larger of the two vessels resulting from the division of the brachial at the elbow, extending along the inner side of the forearm into the palm of the hand, where it forms the superficial palmar arch. Besides numerous muscular branches, it gives off the anterior and posterior ulnar recurrent arteries (see recurrent), the interosseous, and the anterior and posterior ulnar carpals.—Ulnar carpal arteries, two small branches, the anterior and the posterior, given off from the ulnar artery at the wrist to the anterior and posterior surfaces.

—Ulnar nerve, a large branch of the brachial plexus, from the inner cord, distributed to the elbow-joint, ulnocarpal and deep digital flexors, and some of the muscles and a part of the skin of the hand. It gives off the dorsalis ulnaris, or dorsal cutaneous branch, to the skin of the wrist and hand, the palmaris superficialis to the palmaris brevis and skin of the little finger, and the palmaris profundus to most of the small muscles of the palm.

ulnare (ul'nä're), n.: pl. ulnaria (-ri-ä). [NL. (sc. os, bone), neut. of ulnaris; see ulnar.] 1. A bone of the wrist, that one of the proximal carpal bones which is upon the ulnar side, in man the cuneiform; opposed to radiale. See cuts under Artiodactyla, carpus, hand, Perissodactyla, and Phossiaurus.—2. In ornith., that one of the two free carpal bones which is upon the ulnar side (the other being the radiale), not necessarily with the implication that it is the cuneiform of a mammal. See cut under pinion.

ulnocarpal (ul-nö-kär'pal), a. Common to the ulna and the carpus; as, an ulnocarpal articulation.

ulnometacarpal (ul-nö-met-a-kär'pal), a. Of or pertaining to the ulna and the metacarpus; specifying certain muscles of a bird's wing. Also ulnometacarpal.

ulnometacarpalis (ul-nö-met-a-kär-pa'lis), n.: pl. ulnometacarpales (-léz). [NL.: cf. ulnometacarpal.] In ornith., a muscle of the wing which arises from the ulna and is inserted into a metacarpal bone. Two such muscles are distinguished as ulnometacarpalis ventralis and dorsalis. Also ulnometacarpalis.

ulnoradial (ul-nö-ra'di-al), a. Of or pertaining to the ulna and the radius; common to these bones, as an articulation.

Ulodendron (u-lö-den'dron), n. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, a seat (ὕλη, be whole or sound, become healed), + δένδρον, tree.] A genus of fossil plants, closely allied to Uplodendron, and by some authors considered as belonging to, or being a peculiar condition of, this genus. The leaf-scars of Ulodendron are disposed in spiral order, are comparatively small, and do not vary much in dimensions, not being much larger upon trunks of great size than upon smaller ones. They are either rhomboidal in shape or drawn out at both ends into a spindle shape. The fruitification is a long cylindrical strobile. The characteristic feature of Ulodendron is the existence of a double series of concave disk-like depressions, of large size, round or oval in shape, and increasing in dimensions with the growth of the plant from below upward. These large scars, or disks as they are sometimes called, are arranged in vertical rows, alternating on each side of the stem, and are marked in the center by a small mamilla, around which scales or leaf-scars are concentrically arranged, which become more or less obscure, or are entirely obliterated, with the growth of the plant. The nature and function of these peculiar scars have been the object of much discussion among fossil botanists; but the most generally received opinion is that they were the points of attachment of masses of inflorescence, which consisted of sessile cones formed of imbricated scales in a manner similar to a fir-cone. Ulodendron is a widely distributed genus in Europe and America, and very characteristic of the lower section of the Carboniferous series.

Ulonatæ (ü-lö-nä'tä), n. pl. [NL. (Fabricius, 1793); formation uncertain; perhaps < Gr. ὕλη, a hollow, a narrow space.] A group of mandibulate insects, in the system of Fabricius, composed of the genera Jerydium, Gryllus, Trurialis, Fargiella, Blattia, Mantis, Achela, and Locusta: an absolute synonym of Orthoptera.

Ulophocinæ (ü-lö-fö-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ὕλη, woolly, + φύκη, a seal, + -inæ.] A section of Ulotrichia, containing the true fur-seals, as distinguished from the Trichophocinæ or hair-seals of the same family. Also Oulophocinæ. See cut under fur-seal.

ulophocine (ü-lö-fö-sin), a. Of or pertaining to the Ulophocinæ.

ulorrhagia (ü-lö-rä'ji-ä), n. Same as ulorrhagia.

Ulothrix (ü-lö-thriks), n. [NL. (Kützinger, 1845), < Gr. ὕλη, woolly, + θρίξ (thrîx), hair.] A genus of coniferoid algae, typical of the order Ulotrichales.

Ulotrichaceæ (ü-lö-tri-kä'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Ulothrix (-trich-) + -acæ.] A small order of coniferoid algae, typified by the genus Ulothrix. They are aquatic or terrestrial green or yellowish-green plants, each composed of an unbranched filament of short cells that are usually broader than they are long.

ulotrichan (ü-lö'tri-kän), n. and a. [Ulotrichi + -an.] 1. n. A member of the Ulotrichi.

II. a. Ulotrichous.

Ulotrichi (ü-lö'tri-ki), n. pl. [NL. pl. of ulotrichus; see ulotrichous.] One of the two primary groups into which the races of men are divided by Bory de Saint-Vincent, the other being the Liotrichi. The Ulotrichi are those with crisp or woolly hair. The color of the skin varies from yellow-brown to the blackest known; the hair and eyes are normally dark; the skull is dolichocephalic, with a few exceptions among the Andaman Islanders. The negroes and Bushmen of ultra-Saharan Africa and the Negroes of members of this group.

ulotrichous (ü-lö'tri-ki-s), a. [Ulotrichus, < Gr. ὕλη, woolly, + θρίξ (thrîx), hair.] Having crisp woolly hair; belonging to the Ulotrichi.

ulster (ul'stér), n. [Ulster, a province of Ireland.] 1. A type of long loose overcoat, worn by both men and women; originally made of frieze cloth in Ulster. The peculiarity of the coat is that it is almost straight for both sexes, reaching very nearly to the feet, and is sometimes girded with a belt; it often has a hood or cape.

Over my shoulders was a drenched Leopard skin, beneath which could be seen my travel-stained, much-worn ulster overcoat. O'Donovan, Merv, xvi.

2. [cap.] Same as Ulster king-at-arms.

Ulster custom. The form of tenant-right (in full, Ulster tenant-right custom) established by custom in the province of Ulster in Ireland, and recognized by the statutes of 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 46) and 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 49). It is regarded as including the right of a yearly tenant to continue his occupancy so long as the rent, or a fair rent adjusted in view of the value of the land exclusive of buildings, is paid, to dispose of his tenancy to a suitable successor, and to require compensation if the landlord resumes possession for his own use.

ulstered (ul'stér-d), a. [ulster + -ed.] Wearing an ulster. R. Broughton, Second Thoughts, i. 5.

ulstering (ul'stér-ing), n. [ulster + -ing.] Cloth for ulsters. Manufacturers' Rev., XX. 237. [A trade-word.]

Ulster king-at-arms. The king-at-arms for Ireland. See king-at-arms.

ult. An abbreviation of ultimo.

ulterior (ul-tē-ri-ör), a. and n. [= F. ulérieur = Sp. ulterior = It. ulteriore, < L. ulterior, compar. of ulter, that is beyond. Cf. ultra.]

I. a. 1. Being or situated beyond or on the further side of any line or boundary.—2. Not at present in view or in consideration; in the future or in the background; beyond what is seen or avowed; remote; as, what ulterior measures will be adopted is uncertain.

The ulterior accomplishment of that part of it [Scripture]. Boyle, Works, II. 130.

When a thing has served an end to the utmost, it is wholly new for an ulterior service. Emerson, Nature, v.

II. n. The further side; the remote part. Cohridge. [Rare.]

ulteriorly (ul-tē-ri-ör-li), adv. In an ulterior manner; more distantly; remotely.

ultima (ul'ti-mä), a. and n. [L., fem. of ultimus, superl. of ulter, that is beyond or on the other side; see ultimate.] I. a. Most remote; furthest; final; last.—Ultima ratio, the last reason or argument.—Ultima ratio regum, the last reason of kings; resort to arms or war.—Ultima Thule. See Thule.

II. n. In gram., the last syllable of a word.

ultima, n. Latin plural of ultimatum.

ultimate (ul'ti-mät), a. [= Sp. último, ultimado, < ML. ultimatus, furthest, last, pp. of L. ultimare, come to an end, < ultimus, last, final, superl. of ulter, that is on the other side; see ultra.] 1. Furthest; most remote in place.

Looking over the ultimate sea.

Bret Harte, The Two Ships.

2. Last; the last of a series of three or more members, especially of a series in which an inquiry is traced from one member to another; as, the ultimate signification of a phrase; an ultimate principle; an ultimate fact. Ultimate applies to the last of a series of events in time, as well as to other series. In special cases it is synonymous with final, except that it implies at least two preceding members, which final does not; and this circumstance gives the idea of a climax, and so emphasizes ultimate. But more frequently the series to which ultimate refers is a regressive one, so that it is quite opposed to final. Thus, ultimate cause means the original cause beyond which no causation can be traced; but final cause is the end toward which action is directed.

Worst is my port,

My harbour, and my ultimate repose.

Milton, P. R., iii. 210.

What are we? and whence came we? What shall be Our ultimate existence? Byron, Don Juan, vi. 63.

Those ultimate truths and those universal laws of thought which we cannot rationally contradict. Coderige.

[Science] is teaching the world that the ultimate count of appeal is observation and experiment, and not authority. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 118.

Any great building seems to me, while I look at it, the ultimate expression. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 79.

There is no doubt a real difficulty here; and the shortest way of dealing with it would be to confess it insoluble and ultimate. W. James, Mind, XII. 27.

3. In cutum, specifically noting a stage of the second larva, after the third molt, of those insects which undergo hypermetamorphosis, as the blister-beetles (Meloidæ). It succeeds the searaboid stage, and is followed by the eocate larva.—Prime and ultimate ratios. See ratio.—Ultimate abstraction, the consideration of anything in so far as it is described in its definition, without reference to any other circumstance.—Ultimate analysis, in chem., the resolution of a substance into its absolute elements; opposed to proximate analysis, or the resolution of a substance into its constituent compounds.—Ultimate cause, a primary cause.

Mr. Adams had a great mind, quick, comprehensive, analytical, not easily satisfied save with ultimate causes. Theo. Parker, Historic Americans, John Adams, vi.

Ultimate element, an indecomposable element.—Ultimate end, an end to which no other is ulterior.—Ultimate fact, a fact not capable of being explained, rendered intelligible, or in any way subjected to reason; a brute fact.—Ultimate principle, a first principle.—Ultimate significate, in nominative logic, an individual significate, not a universal which, considered as a name, has a further significate.—Ultimate species, a species between which and the individuals there is no lower species; a lowest species. = Syn. 2. Eventual, Conclusive, etc. See final.

ultimate (ul'ti-mät), v. i.: pret. and pp. ultimated, ultimating. [ML. ultimatus, pp. of L. ultimare, come to an end, be at the last; see ultimate, a.] To result finally; end. [Rare.]

Believing that they [the socialistic tendencies of our time] must ultimate, if successful, in an increase of egoism and restriction of individual liberty. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 564.

ultimately (ul'ti-mät-li), adv. As an ultimate or final result; at last; in the end or outcome; at the furthest point of a series; finally.

ultimateness (ul'ti-mät-nes), n. The state or character of being ultimate; a final or definitive condition.

To have in it a certain completeness, ultimateness, and sacredness. The Century, XXVIII. 636.

ultimatum (ul'ti-mä'tum), n.: pl. ultimatums or ultimata (-tumz, -tā). [= F. ultimatum, < NL. ultimatum, a final statement, neut. of ML. ultimatus, final, ultimate; see ultimate, a.] A final proposal or statement of conditions; especially, in diplomatic negotiations, the final terms of one of the parties, the rejection of which may involve an immediate rupture of diplomatic relations and even lead to a declaration of war.

He delivered to the mediators an ultimatum, importing that he adhered to the treaties of Westphalia and Nimwegen. Smollett, Hist. Eng., i. 5. ultimet (ul'tim), a. [< F. ultime = Sp. último = Pg. lt. última, < L. ultimus, last; see ultimate.] Last; final; ultimate. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 99.

Nothing was wanting now to the perfecting of this League but the ultime and completing act, the solemn confirmation by Oath.

H. L'Estrange, Reign of K. Charles (ed. 1655), p. 105.

ultimty (ul-tim'i-ti), n. [< ML. ultimita(-t)s, < L. ultimus, last; see ultime, ultimate.] The last stage or consequence. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 838.

ultimo (ul'ti-mō), adv. [L., abl. sing. masc. (se. mense, month) of ultimus, last; see ultime.] In the month which preceded the present; in the last month, as distinguished from the current or present month and all others. It is usually abbreviated ult.: as, on the 12th ult.—that is, on the 12th day 'in the last month,' ultimo being a Latin adjective agreeing with mense, month, understood. Compare instant, a., 1, and proximo.

ultimogeniture (ul'ti-mō-jen'i-tūr), n. [< L. ultimus, last, + genitura, geniture.] A system of inheritance, such as is called in England borough-English, by which the youngest son succeeds to the estate; opposed to primogeniture.

ultimus hæres (ul'ti-mus hē-rēz), [L.: ultimus, last; hæres, heres, heir; see ultimate and heir.] In law, the last or final heir. Thus, in cases of intestate succession, failing relations of every kind, the succession devolves on the state or crown as ultimus hæres.

ultion (ul'shon), n. [< OF. ultion, < L. ultio(n-), an avenging, < ulcisci, pp. ultus, take vengeance on, punish.] Revenge.

To forgive our enemies is a charming way of revenge, . . . and to do good for evil a soft and melting ultion, a method taught from heaven, to keep all smooth upon earth.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii. 12.

ultra (ul'trā), a. and n. [< ultra-, q.v.] I. a. Extreme; extravagant; fanatical: as, ultra measures.

The extreme or Ultra party.

Milman, Latin Christianity.

II. n. One who advocates extreme views or measures; an extremist; an ultraist.

The "Ultras" would have owned him for their leader, and would have admitted that he went beyond them in the uncompromising consistency of his extravagant dogmas.

Brougham, Hist. Sketches, Burke.

ultra-, [< L. ultra, adv. beyond, further, moreover, more, besides, prep. beyond, on the further side, past; orig. fem. abl. of ulter, on the other side; see ulterior, ultimate.] Hence ultra, a. and n., and outrage. I. A Latin preposition used as a prefix, signifying 'beyond.' (a) Beyond; on the further side of: chiefly with words implying natural objects forming great barriers, boundaries, or landmarks: as, ultramarine, ultramontane, ultramundane. (b) Exceedingly; excessively; beyond what is reasonable, natural, or right: with words admitting of degrees, especially political and polemical terms: as, ultraconservative, ultraliberal, ultracatholic, ultracatholic.

ultrabernoullian (ul'trā-bēr-nō'li-an), a. Resulting from an extension of the theory of Bernoullian numbers.—Ultrabernoullian numbers, the coefficients of the development

$$n^r = \sum_{i=0}^n A_i r^i (i+1)! / (n+i-r)! r!.$$

ultracapillary (ul'trā-kap'i-lā-ri), a. In bot., exceedingly slender; composed of exceedingly fine capillary filaments: as, an ultracapillary thallus.

ultracentenarianism (ul'trā-sen-te-nā'ri-an-izm), n. The state or condition of living to the age of more than one hundred years. Pop. Sci. Mo., XX. 97. [Rare.]

ultraclassical (ul'trā-klas'i-ka), a. Being excessively classical, or classical to an extreme or exaggerated degree: as, an ultraclassical musical composition.

ultraconservatism (ul'trā-kon-sēr'vā-tizm), n. Unreasonable conservatism; extreme opposition to innovation or change.

ultraconservative (ul'trā-kon-sēr'vā-tiv), a. Conservative in the extreme.

ultracosmopolitan (ul'trā-kōz-mō-pol'i-tān), a. Cosmopolitan in an extreme, or offensive degree. New Princeton Rev., 1. 2.

ultracritical (ul'trā-krit'i-ka), a. Excessively critical; over-critical.

ultra-elliptic (ul'trā-e-lip'tik), a. Hyperelliptic.

ultrafashionable (ul'trā-fash'on-a-bl), a. Fashionable in the extreme; over-fashionable.

ultrafederalist (ul'trā-fed'ē-rā-l-ist), n. In U. S. hist., an extreme federalist.

ultra-gaseous (ul'trā-gas'ē-us), a. See radiant matter, under radiant.

ultrage (ul'trāj), n. [< ML. ultragium, < L. ultra, beyond; see outrage.] Outrage.

ultraism (ul'trā-izm), n. [< ultra- + -ism.] 1. The principles of ultras, or men who advocate extreme measures, as a radical reform, etc.

New England Senators and Representatives have, from the very idea of their ultraism, little or no direct weight in Congress. Wendell Phillips, Speeches, etc., p. 334.

2. An extreme or radical statement or action.

We would also, in spite of some ultraisms in thought and language, . . . recommend heartily the papers of Mr. Forbes. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 28.

ultraist (ul'trā-ist), n. [< ultra- + -ist.] An ultra; an extremist.

ultramarine (ul'trā-mā-rēn), n. and a. [= Sp. Pg. ultramarino, < L. ultra, beyond, + marinus, marine.] I. n. 1. A beautiful natural blue pigment, obtained from the mineral lapis lazuli, a variety of lazulite. This stone occurs in Siberia, Persia, Tibet, and some other localities. (See lapis lazuli, under lapis.) Small golden specks of iron pyrites are usually scattered through it. To prepare the pigment, selected pieces are heated, and cooled in water, producing disintegration. The powder is then purified by repeated washings, the several wash-waters depositing pigments of different depths of color, the gray powder known as ultramarine ash being the last and least valuable product. Ultramarine is very permanent under all conditions, and is, in color, the purest blue available. Its use is limited, however, by its great cost, and also by the fact that artificial ultramarine is practically as valuable. The color of both natural and artificial ultramarine is a rather dark and intensely chromatic violet blue. The natural ultramarine is only slightly violet, the artificial is very much so. Also called lazulite-blue.

2. Azure-stone.—Artificial ultramarine, the common ultramarine of commerce, prepared by grinding together a mixture of clay, carbonate of soda, sulphur, and rosin: discovered about 1830 by the chemist Guichin, and now produced on a large scale in Germany, France, and the United States. The mixture is heated in closed crucibles in a furnace for several hours, and slowly cooled. A greenish porous cake is the product. This is the green ultramarine of commerce. The material is again powdered and again subjected to calcination, when upon cooling there results the proper blue color. It has never been determined to what cause this color is due. Certain variations in the proportion of the ingredients produce violet-blue colors. Also French, Guinot, new, and permanent blue.—Green ultramarine. See artificial ultramarine, above.—Native ultramarine. Same as def. 1.—Yellow ultramarine, barium chromate. See barium.

II. a. Situated or being beyond the sea.

The loss of the ultramarine colonies lightened the expenses of France. Burke, State of the Nation.

Ultramarine ashes, the residuum of lapis lazuli after the ultramarine has been extracted, used as a pigment by some old masters as a middle or neutral tint for flesh, skies, and draperies: it is a purer and tenderer gray than that produced by mixture of more positive colors. Fairholt.—Ultramarine blue. See 1.—Ultramarine green. See green.

ultramicroscopic, ultramicroscopical (ul'trā-mī-kro-skop'ik, -i-ka), a. Beyond the power of a microscope to make visible; too small to be seen with a microscope. Amer. Meteor. Jour., III. 131.

ultramontane (ul'trā-mon'tān), a. and n. [= *F. ultramontain = Sp. Pg. lt. ultramontano, < NL. ultramontanus, < L. ultra, beyond, + montanus, of or pertaining to a mountain, < mon(t)-s, mountain. Cf. transmontane.] I. a. Being or lying beyond the mountains; transmontane: opposed to cismontane. Specifically—(a) Lying or belonging to the north of the Alps, in reference to Italy: the sense in which the epithet was originally used. Transmontane is now more generally employed. (b) Lying to the south of the Alps—that is, beyond the mountains as regards the countries to the north of the Alps; Italian; specifically, of or belonging to the Italian party in the Church of Rome; holding the doctrines of ultramontanism.—Ultramontane party, in German politics, the Center party, which opposes legislation supposed to be inimical to the Church of Rome.

II. n. One who resides beyond the mountains; a foreigner. Specifically—(a) Formerly, one who resided north of the Alps; hence, one who maintains the rights of the northern churches, as the Gallican, in opposition to the claims of universal supremacy put forth for the popes; one who is unfavorable to papal claims of supremacy and infallibility.

He is an ultramontane, of which sort there hath been none [no pope] these fifty years. Bacon, Obs. on a Libel.

To the petition of the Banneries of Rome for a promotion of Cardinals, he [Pope Urban VI.] openly avowed his design to make so large a nomination that the Italians should resume their ascendancy over the Ultramontanes. Milman, Latin Christianity, xiii. 1.

(b) One who resides south of the Alps, or who identifies himself with the Italian party in the Roman Catholic Church, and maintains the doctrine of absolute papal supremacy. See ultramontanism.

To the Ultramontane, holding that the temporal welfare no less than the eternal salvation of men depends on submission to the Church, it is incredible that Church-authority has but a transitory value.

H. Spencer, Study of Social, p. 209.

ultramontanism (ul'trā-mon'tā-nizm), n. [= F. ultramontanisme = Sp. Pg. ultramontanismo; as ultramontane + -ism.] The doctrines of the ultramontanes; the views of that party in the Church of Rome which places an absolute anthority in matters of faith and discipline in the hands of the Pope, in opposition to the views of that party which would place the national churches, such as the Gallican, in partial independence of the Roman curia, and make the Pope subordinate to the statutes of an ecumenical council. According to ultramontanism, the Pope is superior to general councils, independent of their decrees, and is considered to be the source of all jurisdiction in the church. The Vatican Council of 1869–70 virtually established the views of ultramontanism as dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church.

ultramontanist (ul'trā-mon'tā-nist), n. [< ultramontanism + -ist.] One of the ultramontane party; a promoter of ultramontanism.

ultramundane (ul'trā-mun'dān), a. [< L. ultra, beyond, + mundus, world; see mundum.] 1. Being beyond the world, or beyond the limits of the solar system; as, ultramundane spaces. Boyle, Works, V. 140.

These atoms [all atoms in space] he [Le Sage] calls ultramundane corpuscles, because he conceives them to come in all directions from regions far beyond that part of the system of the world which is in any way known to us. Encyc. Brit., III. 46.

2. Being beyond this world, or the physical sphere of existence.

ultranominalistic (ul'trā-nom-i-nā-lis'tik), a. Maintaining that nothing is real but individual substances, and that all resemblances and other relations are words, and nothing more.

ultrapartizan (ul'trā-pār'ti-zān), a. Partizan in the extreme; offensively partizan.

ultra-Pauline (ul'trā-pā'lin), a. Excessively Pauline; rigidly attached to the doctrines of the apostle Paul. The Congregationalist, June 28, 1883.

ultra-Protestant (ul'trā-prot'es-tant), a. Protestant in the extreme.

ultra-Protestantism (ul'trā-prot'es-tan-tizm), n. Ultra-Protestant doctrines or methods.

A spirit of ultra-Protestantism mingled with and became an animating principle of the opposition which was raised against his [James H. S.] assaults upon the constitution. Sir E. Creney, Eng. Const., p. 275.

ultra-red (ul'trā-rēd), a. Beyond the red; used of the invisible heat-rays, less refrangible than those forming the lower or red part of the spectrum, more commonly called the infra-red rays. See spectrum.

ultra-religious (ul'trā-rē-lī'j-us), a. Religious in the extreme; excessively religious.

They were all prophetic, Toryish, ultra-religious. Carlyle, in Froude (First Forty Years), II. viii.

ultra-sensual (ul'trā-sen'su-āl), a. Above or beyond the sensual. Carlyle, in Froude (First Forty Years), II. xvi.

ultra-violet (ul'trā-vī'ō-let), a. Beyond the violet; used of the invisible rays of the spectrum which are more refrangible than the violet, and consequently lie beyond them. See spectrum.

ultra vires (ul'trā vī-rēz), [L.: ultra, beyond (see ultra-); vires, acc. pl. of vis, strength, power; see vim.] Beyond one's power; specifically, beyond the legal or constitutional power of a person, court, or corporation. In the law of corporations an act is said to be ultra vires (a) when it is not within the scope of the powers of the corporation to perform it under any circumstances or for any purpose; or (b) with reference to the rights of members, when the corporation is not authorized to perform it without their consent; or (c) with reference to some specific purpose, when it is not authorized to perform it for that purpose.

ultra-virtuous (ul'trā-vēr'vī-tūs), a. Pharisaic.

An ultra-virtuous Irish Bamey. George Eliot, Silly Novels by Lady Novelists.

ultra-zodiacal (ul'trā-zō-di'ā-ka), a. Passing beyond the zodiac.—Ultra-zodiacal planet, one of the planetoids between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter; so called because most of them have orbits much inclined to the ecliptic.

ultramotivity (ul'trō-mō-tiv'i-ti), n. [< L. ultra (see ultramotus) + motivity.] Capability of spontaneous movement.

ultroneous (ul'trō-nē-us), a. [< L. ultro, spontaneously, on his, their, etc., part, lit. on the other side, beyond, further, abl. neut. of ulter, < ulter, being on the other side; see ultra-, ultrior.] Spontaneous; voluntary. Jer. Taylor, Ultroneous witness, in Scots law, a witness who offers his testimony without being regularly cited.

ultroneously (ul'trō-nē-us-lī), adv. In an ultroneous manner; of one's own free will. Sir W. Hamilton.

ultroneousness (ul'trō-nē-us-nes), n. The character of being ultroneous; spontaneity.

Ulula (ū'lū-lā), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817, after Barrère, 1745), < L. ulula, a screech-owl.] 1.

A genus of hoot-owls. It has been variously applied, but is now usually regarded as a synonym of Syrnium. Compare ullul. See cut under hawk-owl.—2. A genus of neuropterous insects. Rambur, 1842.

ululant (ul'p-lant), a. [< L. ululan(-t)s, pp. of ululare, howl, yell: see ululate.] Ullulating: howling; hooting or screeching, as an owl.

ululate (ul'p-lāt), v. i.: pret. and pp. ululated, pp. ululating. [< L. ululatus, pp. of ululare (> It. ululare, ululare = Sp. Pg. ulular), howl, screech: see owl.] 1. To howl, as a dog or a wolf. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 113.—2. To hoot or screech, as an owl.

ululation (ul'p-lā'shon), n. [< L. ululatio(-n)s, a howling, a wailing, < ululare, howl: see ululate.] A howling, as of the wolf or dog; a wailing.

It a temporal loss fall on us, we entertain it with ululations and tears. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 415. (Daries.)

There sighs, complaints, and ululations loud Resounded through the air.

Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, iii. 22.

Ullulinae (ū-lū-lī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Ullula + -inae.] A subfamily of Strigidae, containing owls of the genus Ullula and some others.

Ulva (ul'vā), n. [NL., < L. ulva, sedge.] A genus of algae, typical of the order Ulvaceae, having a flat membranaceous bright-green frond. U. latissima and U. lactuca are sometimes eaten. See green liver (under liver), scallot (under lettuce), and Enteromorpha.

Ulvaceae (ul-vā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Ulva + -aceae.] A small order of fresh- or brackish-water algae of uncertain systematic position, but usually placed with the Florideae. They have a flat or tubular frond of a bright-green color, composed of either one or two layers of cells. Propagation is by means of zoogonidia.

ulvaceous (ul-vā'shi-us), a. In bot., resembling or belonging to Ulva or the Ulvaceae.

ulwan (ul'wan), n. [E. Ind.] Plain cloth of the shawl-wool of cashmere, such as is seen in the plain center of embroidered India shawls.

ulyie, ulzie (ūl'yē), n. Scotch forms of oil. Scott, Pirate, xvii.

um-. [*< ME. um-, umbe-, embe-, < AS. ymbe-, ymbe-, embe-, prefix, ymbe-, ymb-, prep., around, about, = OS. umbi = OFries. umbi = D. om- = MLG. um- = OHG. umbi, umpi, umbe, MLG. umbe, G. um = Icel. umbi, um = Sw. Pam. om-, around, about, = L. ambi- = Gr. angō- = Skt. abhi-, against, about, also used as a prefix: see ambi-, amphi-, etc.] This prefix exists, unrecognized, in *ember*² as used in comp. ember-days: see *ember*².] A prefix of Anglo-Saxon and Scandinavian origin, meaning 'around, about,' cognate with ambi- and amphi-. It was formerly common, but is now wholly obsolete, except in a few Scotch words.*

umbari, n. Same as *umber*¹, 4.

umber, prep. [ME., also cumbe, < AS. ymbe-, ymb-, around, about: see um-.] Around; about; after. [Obsolete except in dialectal use in composition.]

Destinution of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 4954.

umbecast (um'be-kāst), v. i. To cast about; make a circuit.

The hound came fast after, and umbecast about, for she had lost the perfect feat of the hind.

Sir T. Malory, Morte d'Arthur, III. cxxiv.

umbel (um'bel), n. [= F. ombelle = Sp. umbela = Pg. It. ombella, < NL. umbella, an umbel, < L. umbella, a sunshade, parasol, umbrella, dim. of umbra, a shade, shadow: see umbra.] 1. An inflorescence consisting of a number of flower-stalks or pedicels, nearly equal in length, spreading from a common center, their summits forming a level, convex, or even globose surface, more rarely a concave one, as in the carrot. See cut under inflorescence, Thapsia, and Eranthis.—2. In zool., an umbelliform tuft, cluster, or group of parts, as of polypites borne upon a polypidom. See cut under Umbellularia.

Compound, simple umbel. See the adjectives.

Universal umbel, in bot. a primary or general umbel: the first or largest set of rays in a compound umbel—opposed to partial umbel. A universal involucre is not infrequently placed at the foot of a universal umbel.

umbella (um-bel'ā), n.: pl. umbellae (-ē). [NL.: see umbel.] In bot., an umbel.

umbellal (um-bel'al), a. [< umbella + -al.] In bot. and zool., same as umbellate: specifically, in bot., of or pertaining to the cohort Umbellales. Lindley.

Umbellales (um-be-lā'lēz), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1835), < umbella, umbel: see umbel.] A cohort of polypetalous plants, of the series Calyciflorae. It is characterized by an inferior ovary, crowned with a disk with distinct or partly divided styles, and with the ovules solitary and pendulous in their cells. It includes the 3 orders Umbelliferae, Araliaceae, and Cornaceae, the parsley, ginseng, and dogwood families.

umbellar (um'be-lār), a. [< umbella + -ar.] In bot. and zool., same as umbellate.

umbellate (um'be-lāt), a. [= It. umbellato, *< NL. umbellatus, < umbella, umbel: see umbel.] 1. In bot., bearing umbels; arranged in umbels; umbel-like: as, umbellate plants, flowers, or clusters.—2. In zool., having an umbel, as a polyp; umbelliferous; having the shape of an umbel; umbelliform.

umbellated (um'be-lā-ted), a. [< umbellate + -ed.] In bot. and zool., same as umbellate.

umbellately (um'be-lāt-lī), adv. In an umbellate manner. De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 153.

umbellet (um'be-let), n. [< umbel, umbella, + -et.] A little or partial umbel; an umbel formed at the end of one of the primary rays of a compound umbel; an umbellule. See cut under Osmerichia.

umbellifer (um-bel'i-fēr), n. [< NL. umbellifer: see umbelliferous.] In bot., a plant of the order Umbelliferae.

Umbelliferae (um-be-lif'ē-rē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789), fem. pl. (see L. plantae, plants) of umbellifer: see umbelliferous.] An order of plants, of the cohort Umbellales, known as the parsley family. It is distinguished by a two-celled ovary forming in fruit a cremocarp consisting commonly of two dry one-celled and one-seeded mericarps or achenes, separating from each other at maturity, and hanging from the top of a slender axis or carpophore. It includes about 179 genera with about 1,400 species, classed in 9 tribes, of which Hydrocotyle, Mulinum, Sanicula, Echinophora, Anani, Seseli, Pucedanum, Caucalis, and Laserpitium are the types. They are natives chiefly of north temperate regions, especially numerous in Europe and Asia, reaching the arctic zone and mountains within the tropics, also numerous in the temperate parts of South America, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand. Most of the species are herbs with dissected alternate leaves of many ternate or pinnate leaflets, the petiole commonly dilated into a sheathing base. The flowers are small, usually white or yellow, and borne in simple or compound umbels, generally furnished with a row of narrow bracts forming an involucre or involucre. Each flower consists commonly of five small imbricated petals, as many stamens indexed in the bud, and an ovary crowned with an epigynous two-lobed disk which rises into two conical stylopodia, each tipped with a distinct filiform style. The fruit is commonly traversed by canals (oil-tubes or ritta) filled with a liquid or gummy oil of a highly penetrating and characteristic odor. The genera resemble one another closely, and are distinguished mainly by the ridges, the oil-tubes, and the commissure or inner face of the fruit: each carpel bears five primary ridges (juga), and frequently also five intermediate secondary ones, the channels (collocaria) between them often containing oil-tubes. Many are protogynous, or mature their pistils earlier than the stamens, thus securing cross-fertilization. The order is one of strongly marked properties; many umbelliferous plants contain a poisonous, acrid, watery liquid, especially the hemlock (see also Caulium, Cicuta, Eranthis, and Elymus). Many species yield stimulating gum-resins, as asafoetida, asafetida, galbanum, opopanax, and gumi ammoniacum (see also Ferula, Thapsia, and Laserpitium). Others contain a carminative aromatic oil, and furnish condiments, as anise, dill, caraway, coriander, and cummin. From another group these principles are nearly absent, and the stem or leaf becomes edible, as parsley, celery, and samphire, or the root, as the carrot, parsnip, and skirret. Others are of great medicinal repute, as fennel and species of Eryngium and Archangelica. The order is remarkable for its little resemblance or close relationship to any other except the Araliaceae, which are, however, readily distinguished by their usually fleshy fruit, often of more than two carpels. Perhaps no other order is so free from variation or from exceptional forms, although in a few genera the characteristic habit is greatly disguised—as in Eryngium, where the umbels are replaced by compact heads; Hydrocotyle, with roundish undivided leaves; and Xanthoxia, with broad and showy white involucre.

umbelliferous (um-be-lif'ē-rus), a. [< NL. umbellifer, bearing an umbel, < umbella, umbel, + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing an umbel or umbels; of or pertaining to the Umbelliferae: as, an umbelliferous genus.

umbelliform (um-bel'i-fōrm), a. [< NL. umbella, umbel, + L. forma, form.] Forming an umbel, or having its form.

Umbellularia (um-bel-ū-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Nees, 1836), from the umbellate flowers: < umbellula, a little umbel: see umbellule.] 1. A genus of apetalous trees, of the order Laurineae and tribe Likaneae. It is distinguished from Litsea (the type) by extreme anthers in the fourth row, and forms, in its stamens, a connecting-link to the other chief tribe, Persea. The principal species, U. Californica, the spice-tree (which see), mountain-laurel, or Californian bay-tree, is a tall smooth Californian tree, reduced southward and in the mountains to a small shrub. It bears alternate vixiny and obovate evergreen leaves, and numerous short-pedicelled yellowish-green flowers, each umbel at first included in a caducous globose involucre, and followed by one or two roundish dark-purple drupes. A second species occurs in Mexico.

2. In zool., a genus of deep-sea alcyonarian polyps, having the polypites clustered in an umbel on top of the polypidom, and a long slender stalk somewhat bulbous at the base, as in U. cuvrinus or U. granlandica. Lamarck, 1801.

Umbellularia granlandica.

umbellule (um-bel'ū-lāt), a. [*< NL. *umbellulatus, < umbellula, an umbellule: see umbellule.] In bot., provided with or arranged in umbellules or umbellets.

umbellule (um-bel'ū-lāt), n. [*< NL. umbellula, dim. of umbellula, umbel: see umbel.] A partial umbel; an umbellet. See umbel.

umber¹ (um'bēr), n. [Also umbr, formerly also umber (def. 2); < ME. umbr, < OF. (and F.) ombre, shade, shadow, umber (fish), = Sp. umbrā, umbrā, umber (fish). = It. umbrā, shade, < L. umbrā, shade, shadow, a fish so called: see umbrā.] 1. Shade.

or flowers sweets of vine or other tree

In umber dried may reserved be.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 198.

2. A fish, the grayling. See Thymallus.

Salvian takes him [the grayling] to be called Umbra from his swift swimming, or gliding out of sight more like a shadow or a ghost than a fish.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 121.

3. The umber-bird.—4. Same as umber, 3.

umber² (um'bēr), n. and a. [Formerly also umbr, ombre, ombrer; < F. ombre (= It. ombra, umber (short for terre d'ombre) (= It. terra di ombra = Pg. terra de ombria), umber, lit. 'shade-earth' (cf. Sp. sombra de Venecia, Venetian umber; tierra de sombras, umbrā), < L. umbrā, shade, shadow: see *umber*¹.] 1. n. A natural pigment somewhat resembling an ocher, but darker and browner, due to the presence of oxide of manganese. It probably originally came from Umbria in Italy, but now the best varieties come from Cyprus. The natural earth is called raw umber. When it is heated to almost a red heat in a furnace, the brown hydrated oxide of iron is changed into the red oxide of iron, and the pigment becomes redder and deeper in color, and is called burnt umber. Both these umbers are very important colors, both for artists and in house-painting. They are permanent, pure in tone, and of great service in making various tints.

I'll put myself in poor and mean attire,

And with a kind of umber smirch my face.

Shak., As you like it, i. 3. 114.

These figures are (at least) as big as the life; they are done only with umber and shell gold, and the shadowed umbr, as in the pictures of the gods on the doors of Verulam-house.

Aubrey, Lives, Francis Bacon.

Burnt umber. See def.—Raw umber, a highly chromatic but very dark yellow color, like that of the pigment so called. Owing to the small luminosity, it appears greenish, or tending slightly toward olive; but under high illumination it is seen to incline a little toward orange. Its luminosity is about one fourth that of bright chrome-yellow.

II. a. Of a brown color; dark; dusky.

The umber shade

That hides the blush of waking day.

J. R. Drake, Culprit Fay, xxxii.

umber² (um'bēr), v. t. [*< umber*², n.] To color with umber, or as with umber; shade or darken.

Red-ochre rascals umbered with soot and bacon as the English gipsies are. Middleton, Spanish Gypsy, ii. 1.

Thy dark cloud, with umber'd lower,

That hung o'er cliff, and lake, and tower,

Scott, Marmion, v. Int.

I thought the umbered meerschamm was dearly bought at the cost of a brain enfeebled and a will enslaved.

O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, v.

umber-bird (um'bēr-bērd), n. The shadow-bird, umber, or umbrette, Scopus umbretta, an African altricial grallatorial bird allied both to the storks and to the herons, about as large as the night-heron. It is somber-colored, of a dusky brown, with an occipital crest, lives in the woods, and builds a huge domed nest in trees, in which it lays from three to five white eggs. See cut under Scopus.

umberer (um'bēr-ēr), n. The vizor of a helmet.

And then Sir Lamorak knelted downe and unlaced first his umberere and then his owne; and then either kissed other with weeping teares.

Sir T. Malory, Morte d'Arthur, II. xli.

umbery (um'bér-i), a. [\langle *umber*² + -y]. Of or pertaining to umber; of the color of umber; dark-brown; dark; dusky.

umbilic (um-bil'ik), n. and a. [\langle L. umbilicus: see umbilicus]. 1. n. In geom., a point of a surface where the radii of curvature are all equal, and a sphere osculates the surface. The number of umbilics, real and imaginary, on a surface of the *n*th order, is $n(n+2) - 2n + 2$. With the older geometrical writers, an umbilicus is a focus; and an umbilic in the modern sense is analogous to a focus.—Conical umbilic, a conical point of a surface.

II. a. Same as umbilical.

umbilical (um-bil'i-kal), a. [= F. umbilical = Sp. Pg. umbilical = It. umbilicale, \langle *NL. umbilicis (cf. L. umbilicaris: see umbilicaris), \langle L. umbilicus, navel: see umbilicus]. 1. Of or pertaining to the umbilicus; umbilic; omphalic. —2. Formed or placed like a navel; navel-shaped; central.

The Chapter-house is large, supported as to its arched roof by one umbilical pillar.

Before, Tour through Great Britain, II. 335. (Darvies.)

3. Connected through the female line of descent.

The point is interesting, as it relates to the direct lineal ancestress in the female line, or what is sometimes termed umbilical or uterine ancestress, of Queen Victoria.

N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 493.

Umbilical arteries, the continuation of the hypogastric arteries in the fetus from the umbilicus to the placenta, forming, with the umbilical vein, the most essential part of the umbilical cord. These arteries convey venous blood from the fetus to be oxygenated in the placenta. See urachus.—Umbilical cord. (a) In anat., see cord, and cut under uterus. (b) In bot., same as funicle.—Umbilical fissure, hernia, notch. See the nouns.—Umbilical perforation, the large open umbilicus of certain cephalopods, as the nautilus.—Umbilical points, in math., same as foci. See focus.—Umbilical region. See abdominal regions, under abdominal.—Umbilical ring, the fibrous circumference of the navel, through which hernia may protrude.—Umbilical sac. Same as umbilical vesicle.—Umbilical veins (paired at first, usually only one of them persisting), the veins communicating between the placenta and the fetus, along the navel-string, and within the body of the fetus thence to the liver and vena porte and ductus venosus, and consequently between the placenta and general venous system of the fetus. They convey arterialized blood from the placenta to the fetus; at birth they are partly cast off with the navel-string, partly degenerate into the round ligament of the liver.—Umbilical vesicle. See vesicle.—Umbilical vessels, in anat., the umbilical arteries and vein or veins; chiefly allantoic structures, to be distinguished from the omphalomesenteric vessels of the umbilical vesicle. See cuts under embryo and uterus.

umbilicar (um-bil'i-kär), a. [\langle LL. umbilicaris, pertaining to the navel, \langle L. umbilicus, navel: see umbilic and umbilicus]. In math., of or pertaining to an umbilic.—Umbilicar focal conic. See focal.—Umbilicar focus, a focus having a real plane of contact.

Umbilicaria (um-bil-i-kä'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Hoffman), \langle LL. umbilicaris, umbilical: see umbilicar]. A genus of gymnocarpous lichens, giving name to the family Umbilicariaceae, natives of temperate and arctic regions. In times of scarcity some of the arctic species are used as food, as U. arctica, the so-called famine-bread. See lichen, 1.

Umbilicariei (um-bil'i-kä'ri-ä-i), n. pl. [NL., \langle Umbilicaria]. A family of gymnocarpous parmeliaceous lichens, having a horizontal foliaceous blackish-brown coriaceous thallus attached to the substratum at a single point.

umbilicate (um-bil'i-kät), a. [\langle L. umbilicatus, navel-shaped, \langle Umbilicus, navel: see umbilicus]. 1. Shaped like a navel; resembling a navel, as being round and depressed or concave, or as being focal or central, as some pit or depression; umbilicated; umbiliform.—2. Having an umbilicus or umbilicated formation, as a shell or a feather, or marks of the sculpture of an insect: pitted, as a pustule.

umbilicated (um-bil'i-kä-ted), a. [\langle umbilicate + -ed]. Same as umbilicate.

umbilication (um-bil-i-kä'shön), n. [\langle umbilicate + -ion]. A central navel-like depression, like that seen in vesicles of vaccinia or of small-pox; also, the condition of having such a depression.

umbilicular (um-bil-ik'ü-lär), a. [Appar. intended for umbilicar, \langle LL. umbilicaris, pertaining to the navel: see umbilicar]. Of or pertaining to the navel; hence, intensely introspective, in allusion to Indian mystics alleged to attain great sanctity by continuous contemplation of the navel.

This change in tone . . . I attribute to a great extent to the new vistas opened up by the school of evolutionists, and by the writers who have drawn attention of mere umbilicular contemplation, such as Morris, Rossetti, and Swinburne.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 513.

umbilicus (um-bi-li'kus), n.; pl. umbilici (-si). [= F. ombilic (also nombrit) = Sp. umbigo = Pg. embigo = It. umbilico, \langle L. umbilicus, navel, akin to Gr. ὀμφακή, navel: see navel, and cf. numbles.] 1. In anat. and zool., the more or less nearly central point in the walls of the abdomen where the yolk-bag or umbilical vesicle of the embryo hangs, or where the navel-string or umbilical cord enters the belly; the navel; the omphalos. With the absorption of the yolk-bag or the casting off of the navel-string, the umbilicus remains as a characteristic mark or scar. In man it is a little round pit or depression, its center being hollowed in by the traction of the umbilical vessels inside the belly, as these degenerate into fibrous cords passing to the liver and to the bladder, forming the round ligament of the former and the urachus of the latter viscous.

Hence—2. Some navel-like formation; some circumscribed depression or elevation; a sort of button, or a place in which a button might fit: when elevated instead of depressed, oftener called umbo. Specifically—(a) In conch., a circular and more or less centric pit or hollow of the body-whorl of a spiral shell; an umbilicated formation. It is well shown in the figure of the snail here-with.

(b) In ornith.: (1) The little pit or depression on the scape of a feather, at the junction of the rachis and calamus, where the vanes begin to grow. (2) The contracted opening at that end of a feather which is inserted into the skin. These are also known as the superior umbilicus and inferior umbilicus respectively, the former being at the top and the latter at the bottom of the calamus.

3. In bot.: (a) [cap.] An old generic name (A. P. de Candolle, 1801) for the navelwort, Cotyledon Umbilicus. (b) The part of a seed by which it is attached to the placenta; the hilum. See cut under hilum. (c) A depression or an elevation about the center of a given surface. Henslow.—4. In antiqu., an ornamented or painted ball or boss fastened upon each end of the stick on which manuscripts were rolled.—5. In geom., a term used by the older geometers as synonymous with focus; in modern works, a point in a surface through which all lines of curvature pass.—6. The raised central boss of a large plateau or dish, often made to fit the hollow foot of the ewer which stands upon it and forms one design with the dish.

umbiliferous (um-bi-lif'ë-rus), a. [\langle L. umbilicus, the navel, + ferre = E. bear]. Having an umbilicus or navel-like formation.

umbiliform (um'bi-li-för-m), a. [\langle L. umbilicus, the navel, + forma, form]. Having the form or aspect of the umbilicus; like a navel.

umblet (um'bl), a. An old spelling of humble.

Religious umble and trewe also.

Room of the Rose, I. 614.

umble-pie (um'bl-pi), n. Same as humble-pie. umblest, n. pl. The entrails of a deer: same as numbles.

This day I had a whole doe sent me by Mr. Hozier, which is a fine present, and I had the umbles of it for dinner.

Pepys, Diary, III. 301.

umbo (um'bō), n.; pl. umbones (um-bō'néz). [NL., \langle L. umbo (n), the boss of a shield, any boss, knob, projection, also poet. a shield; akin to Gr. ὀμφακή, a boss, elevation, pulpit (see am-bro), and to L. umbilicus, Gr. ὀμφακή, navel: see umbilicus]. 1. The boss of a shield, central in the case of a circular shield. The umbos sometimes hollow, convex toward the outer side and within allowing the hand to pass into the hollow and grasp a transverse bar; this form occurs especially in small round shields (see buckler); sometimes the umbo terminated in a spike which was a formidable weapon of offense.

2. A boss or knob. (a) In bot., the knob in the center of the pileus or cap of an agaricoid fungus. (b) In zool., a small circumscribed protuberance or convex umbilicus; a button-like formation. Specifically—(1) In conch., the beak of a bivalve shell; the protuberance of each valve above the hinge. The umbo represents the apex of a conoidal figure, and is usually a mere protuberance; sometimes, however, it is greatly prolonged into a kind of horn, which may even be twisted or spirally turned. See cuts under dinorthis, Plicatula, and Mytilus. (2) In echinoderms, a pore-plate; one of the little elevated ambulacral plates or pieces which are perforated for the passage of pedicels or tube-feet. See cut under ambulacrum. (3) In entom., one of certain movable bosses, each surmounted by a spine, on the prothorax of some beetles, as of the genus Macropus, of Acerinus longimanus, etc. Kirby and Spence. (4) In anat., a prominence of the tympanic membrane, or drum of the ear, at the point where the handle of the malleus is attached.

umbonal (um'bō-nal), a. [\langle L. umbo (n), a boss, knob, + -al]. Protuberant, like a knob, boss, or umbo; umbonic; umbonate: as, an umbonal formation.—Umbonal area or region, in conch., a part of each valve of a bivalve toward the umbo and within the pallid line; that part of the shell which is delimited by the mantle-margin.

umbonate (um'bō-nät), a. [\langle *NL. umbonatus, \langle L. umbo (n), a boss, knob]. 1. Having a boss or umbo, as a shield or disk of any sort.—2. In zool.: (a) Formed into an umbo, a boss, or a knob; button-like; umbonal; umbonic. (b) Having an umbo, as a shell; bearing umbones of this or that kind; umbonated: as, both valves strongly umbonate.—3. In bot., bearing an umbo or boss in the center, as the pileus of many species of Agaricus.

umbonated (um'bō-nät-ed), a. [\langle umbonate + -ed]. Same as umbonate.

umbonation (um'bō-nä'shön), n. [\langle umbonate + -ion]. The formation of an umbo; an umbo.

Simple or forked spines, hair-like processes, umbonations, etc. H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Algae, p. 101.

umbones, n. Plural of umbo.

umbonic (um-bon'ik), a. [\langle L. umbo (n), a boss, knob, + -ic]. Of or pertaining to an umbo; umbonal. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 406.

umbonulate (um-bon'ü-lät), a. [\langle *NL. umbonulus, dim. of L. umbo (n), a boss, knob; see umbo]. In bot., terminated by a very small boss or umbo.

umbrä (um'brä), n.; pl. umbræ (-bré). [NL., \langle L. umbrä, shade, shadow: see *umbrä*¹, *umbrä*². Hence ult. umbel, umbral, umbrella, umbrere, penumbra, adumbrate, etc.]. 1. A shadow or shade. Specifically, in astron.: (a) The total shadow of the earth or moon in an eclipse; the dark cone projected from a planet or satellite on the side opposite to the sun. See penumbra (with cut). (b) The dark central part of a sun-spot, which is surrounded by a brighter annular part called the penumbra. See cut under sun-spot.

2. Among the Romans, one who went to a feast merely at the solicitation of one invited: so called because he followed the guest as a shadow.—3. In alg., a symbol which, when paired with another, makes the symbol of a quantity. See umbral notation, under umbral.—Umbrä recta, twelve times the tangent of an angle; umbrä versa, twelve times the cotangent of an angle. These terms are derived from dialing, and refer to two scales upon an astrolabe.

Umbrä² (um'brä), n. [NL. (Gronovius; Cuvier and Valenciennes, 1846), \langle L. umbrä, a fish, the umbrer: see *umbrä*¹]. 1. The only genus of Umbridae; the mud-minnows. See minnow, 2 (v).

Mud minnow (Umbrä lineata).

and Umbridae. There are two species, respectively of Europe and North America, U. krameri and U. lineata.—2. [l. c.] A sciaenoid fish, Umbrina cirrosa; the umbrine. See cut under Umbrina.

unbraced (um'bräst), a. [Appar. an error for or misreading of rambraced]. In her., same as rambraced.

umbracle (um'brä-kl), n. [\langle L. umbraculum, anything that furnishes shade, a shade, shady place, umbrella, dim. of umbrä, shade: see umbrä]. A shade; umbrage.

That Tree (that soul-refreshing umbracle Together with our Sinner) His shoulder teares.

Darvies, Holy Rood, p. 13.

umbracula, n. Plural of umbraculum.

umbraculate (um-brak'ü-lät), a. [\langle *NL. umbraculatus, \langle L. umbraculum, umbrella: see umbracle]. In entom., noting the head when nearly covered by a frontal process which falls over the face and eyes, shading it like an umbrella, as in a few Orthoptera.

umbraculiferous (um-brak'ü-lif'ë-rus), a. [\langle L. umbraculum, umbrella, + ferre = E. bear]. In bot., bearing an organ or part in the form of an expanded umbrella. See cut under pitcher-plant.

umbraculiform (um-brak'ü-li-för-m), a. [\langle L. umbraculum, umbrella, + forma, form]. Having the general form of an umbrella, as a mushroom. See cut under Agaricus.

umbraculum (um-brak'ü-lum), n.; pl. umbracula (-lä). [NL., \langle L. umbraculum, umbrella: see umbracle]. In bot., any one of certain umbrella-shaped appendages. See cut under pitcher-plant.

umbræ, n. Plural of umbrä.

umbrage (um'brä), n. [= F. ombrage, shade, shadow, \langle L. umbrare, to cover, or of pertaining to shade, being in retirement, \langle umbrä, shade a, Umbo on Rondache Shield of the Carolingian period. (From Voyelles le Duc's "Du dit Molher français".)

shadow: see umbra, *umber*¹.] 1. Shade; a shadow; obscurity.

We are past the twilights of conversion, and the umbrages of the world and walk in the light of God.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 841.

His [Wordsworth's] angels and fiends are human thoughts and feelings, and he can awake them at will from the umbra of the old Lydall woods.

Noctes Ambrosianae, April, 1832.

2. That which affords a shade; specifically, a screen of trees or foliage.

The linnets warble, captive none, but hur'd
By food to haunt the umbrage; all the glade
Is life, is music, liberty, and love.

W. Mason, English Garden, iv.

Into trackless forest set

With trees, whose lofty umbrage met.

Wordsworth, Tour in Scotland (1814), The Brownie's Cell.

3. A slight appearance; an apparition; a shade.

Some of them being umbrages . . . rather than realities.
Fuller, Holy War, v. 25. (Encyc. Dict.)

A penitent is not taken with umbrages and appearances, nor quits a real good for an imaginary.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 183.

The opinion carries no show of truth nor umbrage of reason on its side.

Wardlaw.

4. The feeling of being overshadowed, as by another standing in one's light or way; hence, suspicion of slight or injury; offense; resentment.

I say, just fear, . . . not out of umbrages, light jealousies, apprehensions afar off, but out of clear foresight of imminent danger.

Bacon, War with Spain.

So they parted for that time without the least Umbrage of Discontent, nor do I hear of any engendered since.

Huicell, Letters, I. iii. 23.

The Persian ambassador . . . did not care to see any Franks, the port being very suspicious, and the minister very wisely avoided giving umbrage without any reason.

Fauvel, Description of the East, II. ii. 100.

No part of Henry's conduct gave such umbrage to his nobles as the facility with which he resigned himself to the control of favorites.

Prescott, Ferd. and Is., i. 3.

Syn. 4. See *pique*² and animosity.

umbrage (um'brāj), v. t.; pret. and pp. umbraged, ppr. umbraging. [< umbrage, n.] To shade.

A ridge or hillock heavily umbraged with the rounded foliage of evergreen oaks.

Harpur's Mag., LXXVI. 733.

umbrageous (um-brā'jūs), a. [Formerly also umbragous; < F. umbrageux, shady, < umbrage, shade; see umbrage.] 1. Forming or affording a shade; shading; shady.

Consider but the rudiment of a tall and umbrageous tree, from so minute a seed as may be borne away by every blast.

Ecclm, True Religion, I. 29.

Ash far-stretching his umbrageous arm.

Corper, Task, i. 311.

Do they play as formerly with thy crisp glossy curls, so delicate and umbrageous?

Lambert, Imag. Conv., Alcibiades and Xenophon.

2. Shaded; shady; as, an umbrageous glen.

Umbrageous grots and caves

Of cool recess.
Milton, P. L., iv. 257.

3†. Obscure; doubtful, as if from being darkened or shaded; hence, suspicious; "rather shady."

In the present constitution of the Court (which is very umbrageous).

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie.

4†. Apt or disposed to take offense; taking umbrage.

umbrageously (um-brā'jūs-lī), adv. In an umbrageous manner.

umbrageousness (um-brā'jūs-nes), n. The state or quality of being umbrageous; shadiness; as, the umbrageousness of a tree.

umbra (um-brā'), v. t. [ME. umbrayden, umbrayden; *< um- + braid*¹. Cf. upbraid.] To upbraid.

When she of his falseness him umbrayde,

Chaucer, Good Women, I. 1671.

Umbrayde me, I cast one in the teche of an offence that he hath done. . . . What though he have done a mysse, it was nat thy parte to umbrayde hym.

Palsgrave, p. 766.

umbra (um-brā'), n. Strife; contention. Hallivell.

umbral (um-brāl'), a. [< umbra + -al.] Pertaining to an umbra. Umbral notation, a notation for determinants invented by the French mathematician Vandermonde (1735-96) in 1772, but substantially known to Leibnitz. Each constituent of the determinant is represented as the product of two letters, one for the row the other for the column, which letters do not, of course, denote quantities, but only the numerical position of the row or column, so that the product of one of one set by one of the other is equal to a quantity. If the umbral multiplication is commutative, the determinant is symmetrical, if polar, it is skew symmetrical. The name was given by Sylvester.

Umbral (um-brāl'), n. [< L. umbra, shade, twilight, + -al.] In the classification of the Paleozoic series of Pennsylvania, according to H.

D. Rogers, a group of rocks of great thickness, belonging to the Carboniferous, and lying between the Serail or Millstone-grit and the Vespertine. The Umbral and Vespertine together constitute the Subcarboniferous of some authors, or that part of the Carboniferous which lies below the Millstone-grit.

umbrate (um'brat'), v. t. [< L. umbratus, pp. of umbrare (> F. ombrer), shade, overshadow, < umbra, shade, shadow; see *umber*¹.] To shade; shadow; foreshadow.

umbrated (um'brat-ed), a. [< umbrate + -ed.] In her.: (a) Shadowed, or casting a shadow.

(b) Same as entrained. Neither of these uses is strictly heraldic.

Those ensignes which are borne umbrated.

Boswell, Works of Amorie (1572), p. 25. (Encyc. Dict.)

umbratic (um-brat'ik), a. [< L. umbraticus, of or pertaining to shade or shadow, being in retirement, secluded, < umbra, shade; see umbra, *umber*¹. Cf. umbrage.] 1. Shadowy; foreshadowing; hence, casting shadows.

Those umbratic representations (or insinuations) did obtain their substance, validity, and effect.

Burrow, Sermons, II. xxvii.

2. Keeping in the shade or in retirement; secluded; retired.

umbratic (um-brat'ik), a. [< umbratic + -al.] Same as umbratic.

Whole volumes dispatched by the umbratic doctors on all sides.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

umbratile (um'brat-il), a. [< L. umbratilis, remaining in the shade, retired, < umbra, shade; see umbra.] 1. Being in the shade or in retirement; secluded.

Health that hath not been softened by an umbratile life still under the roof.

Bacon.

We must not . . . play the geometrician with our soul, as we may with lines and figures, and things obnoxious to our senses, in this umbratile state and dependence.

Ecclm, True Religion, I. 56.

2. Pertaining to or resembling a shadow or shadows; shadowy.

Shadows have their figure, motion,

And their umbratile action from the real

Posture and motion of the body's act.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, iii. 3.

3. Unreal; unsubstantial.

This life that we live disjoined from God is but a shadow and umbratil imitation of that.

Dr. H. More, Philos. Poems, p. 337, notes.

umbration (um-brā'shon), n. [< LL. umbratio(n-), a shading, shadowing, < L. umbrare, pp. umbratus, shade; see umbrate.] 1. A foreshadowing; adumbration.

Nor all this by transient and superficial knowledge, figures, and umbrations, but immediate and intuitive notices.

Ecclm, True Religion, I. 241.

2. In her., same as adumbration.

umbratious (um-brā'shūs), a. [Irreg. var. of umbrageous, after umbratic, etc.; see umbrageous.] Apt to take umbrage; testy. [Rare.]

Age, . . . which . . . is commonly . . . umbratious and apprehensive.

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie.

umbra-tree (um-brā-trē), n. Same as bellasombra-tree.

umbre, n. See *umber*¹.

umbrel (um'bre), n. [< OF. ombrelle, an umbrella; see umbrella. In def. 3 confused with the form umbrere, which is used in the same sense.] 1†. An umbrella.

Each of them besides bore their umbrels.

Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, I. 8. (Latham.)

2†. A lattice. Hallivell.—3. A defense for the face, attached to a helmet. Also called shade. See also cut under arnet.

umbrella (um-brel'ä), n. [Formerly also umbrello (also umbrel, q. v.); < It. ombrella, umbrelle, an umbrella, sunshade, dim. of ombra, shade, < L. umbra, shade; see umbra. Cf. umbracle, umbel, umbella.] 1. A portable shade, screen, or canopy which opens and folds, carried in the hand for the purpose of sheltering the person from the rays of the sun or from rain. The name was formerly given to a sort of fan used to protect the face from the sun, but is now applied to a light canopy of silk, cotton, or other cloth, extended on a folding frame composed of bars or strips of steel, cane, etc., which slides on a rod or stick. A small and light form of umbrella, carried by women as a protection from the rays of the sun, often in gay colors, or ornamented with ribbons, lace, etc., is habitually called a parasol. The umbrella had its origin in very remote times in the far East, and in some Asiatic countries it was (and still is) regarded as an emblem of royalty or a mark of distinction. In ancient Greece its use was familiar among women for protection from the sun, and it is frequently represented in vase-paintings and terra-cottas. As a defense from rain or snow it was not used in western Europe till early in the eighteenth century. The word is sometimes used figuratively. Compare cloak.

Umbrellists, that is, things that minister shadow unto them [Italians] for shelter against the scorching heat.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 135.

Umbrello (Ital. Ombrellu), a fashion of round and broad Fans, wherewith the Indians (and from them our great ones) preserve themselves from the heat of the sun or fire; and hence any little shadow, Fan, or other thing wherewith women guard their faces from the sun.

Blount, Glossographia (1670).

The tuck'd up sempstress walks with hasty strides,
While streams run down her oil'd umbrella's sides.

Swift, A City Shower.

The inseparable gold umbrella, which in that country [Burma] as much denotes the grandee as the star or garter does in England.

J. W. Palmer, Up and Down the Irrawaddy, p. 90.

Moreover, he [Jonas Hanway] is said to have been the first man who made a practice [about 1750] of using an umbrella while walking in the streets of London.

Dict. Nat. Biog., XXIV. 313.

2. In zool.: (a) The gelatinous disk or swimming-bell of an aculeph, as a jellyfish, by the rhythmical contraction and expansion of which the creature swims, taken either with or without the velum. It is usually the largest, most symmetrical, and most coherent part of the jellyfish, from which other parts hang like streamers, either around its margin or from the center of the under surface. If we compare this bell to a woman's sun-umbrella, lined as well as covered with silk, and having a fringe, then the outer or aboral surface is the exumbrella; the inner or under lining surface is the adumbrella, or adoral surface surrounding the mouth, from which large mouth-parts may hang in the position of the stick or handle of the umbrella; the ring of metal which slides up and down the stick may represent the gastric cavity of the creature, and the metal ribs of the umbrella may suggest the radial canals which go out to the circumference. At points around the margin are the series of adradial, peradial, and interradial sense-organs or other appendages, as tentacles, and where these are long and streaming they represent the fringe of the imagined parasol. See cuts under aculeph, Aurelia, Discophora, and Willisia.

In . . . [Discophora], the aboral end of the hydranth is dilated into a disk or umbrella, which is susceptible of rhythmical contractile movements.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 118.

(b) In conch. [NL. (Lamarck, 1809).] (1) [cap.] A genus of tectibranchiate or pleurobranchiate gastropods; the umbrellas-shells, as U. umbellata. Also Ombrella. (2) A limpet-like tectibranchiate gastropod of the genus Umbrella or family Umbrellidae; an umbrella-shell.

The umbrellas are very large creatures, wearing a flat limpet on the middle of the back, not immersed in the mantle. P. P. Carpenter, Lect. on Mollusca (1861), p. 86.

Umbrella shell (Umbrella umbellata).

umbrella-ant (um-brel'ä-ant), n. A parasol-ant or leaf-carrying ant, which when foraging carries bits of leaves over its back as though for protection, as the snuba-ant, Ecodoma cephalotes. See snuba-ant.

umbrella-bird (um-brel'ä-bërd), n. One of several dragoon-birds, or South American fruit-crows, of the genus Cephalopterus: so called Umbrella-bird (Cephalopterus ornatus).

from the radiating crest which overshadows the head, as in C. ornatus, C. penduliger, and C. glabricollis.

Umbrellacea (um-bre-lä'sc-ä), n. [NL. < Umbrella + -acea.] Same as Umbrellidae. Menke, 1828.

umbrellaed (um-brel'äd), a. [Umbrella + -ed.] Having, or protected by, an umbrella. [Colloq.]

The opening door reveals the advent of more umbrellaed and mackintoshed waterfalls.

Rhoda Broughton, Alas, i.

umbrella-fir (um-brel'ä-fër), n. Same as umbrella-pine.

umbrella-grass (um-brel'ä-gräs), n. 1. An Australian grass, Panicum decompositum, whose millet-like seeds are made by the natives into cakes. Also called Australian millet. It is a semi-aquatic plant, often tall and stout, capable of thriving in poor soils.

2. The Australian grass Aristida ramosa.—3. A cyperaceous plant of the genus Fuirena.

umbrella-leaf (um-brel'ä-lëf), n. A plant of the Berberidaceæ, Diphyllia cymosa, found in wet or springy places in the mountains of Virginia and southward. It has a thick horizontal rootstock sending up each year a huge, centrally petate, cut-lobed and rounded leaf, or a flowering stem with two leaves, petate near the side, the stem terminated by a cyme of white flowers. The genus has but one other species, which belongs to Japan.

umbrella-man (um-brel'ä-man), n. A dealer who has a small stand under an umbrella.

I learned from one umbrella man that, six or seven years previously, he used to sell more portraits of "Mr. Edmund Kean as Richard III." than anything else.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, i. 329.

umbrella-palm (um-brel'ä-päm), n. See umbrella-palm, under palm.

umbrella-pine (um-brel'ä-pîn), n. See Sciadopitys.

umbrella-shell (um-brel'ä-shel), n. A shell of the family Umbrellidae, and especially of the genus Umbrella; an umbrellä. See cut under umbrella.

umbrella-stand (um-brel'ä-stand), n. A stand for holding umbrellas. In a usual form, it has an upright surrounded at a convenient height by a number of rings, through any of which a folded umbrella may be thrust, and a pan at the bottom to receive water trickling from wet umbrellas. Sometimes it has the form of a large metal or porcelain jar.

umbrella-tree (um-brel'ä-trë), n. 1. An American magnolia, Magnolia tripetala (M. Umbellata), widely distributed, but not common, from Pennsylvania southward and southwestward. It is a tree of 30 or 40 feet, with irregular branches, and leaves 18 or 20 inches long by 8 or 10 inches broad; these, radiating from the ends of the shoots, suggest the name. The flowers are cream-white, 4 or 5 inches deep, unpleasantly scented. The tree is fairly hardy, and frequently planted for ornament. The bark, like that of other magnolias, has the property of a gentle stimulant aromatic tonic. Also called elkwood (which see). The screw-pine, Pandanus odoratissimus, is also called by this name.

2. See Thespisia.—Ear-leaved umbrella-tree, Magnolia Fraseri, otherwise called mountain magnolia and long-leaved cucumber-tree, similar to M. tripetala, but having the leaves arched at the base, sweet-scented flowers, etc.—Guinea umbrella-tree, Ribes (Paritum) Guineensis.—Umbrella-tree of Queensland, Brassia actinophylla, of the Araliaceæ, a handsome tree 40 feet high.

umbrella-wort (um-brel'ä-wërt), n. See Orybaphus.

Umbrellidæ (um-brel'i-dë), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1840), < Umbrella + -idæ.] A family of pleurobranchiate gastropods, named from the genus Umbrella. See cut under umbrella.

umbrellot (um-brel'ö), n. An obsolete form of umbrella.

umbreret, n. [Early mod. E. also umbricre (also umber; see umber); < ME. umbrere, umbrere, < OF. umbraire, < umbricre, a shade, the shade over the sight of a helmet, sometimes attached to the vizor, < ombre, shade; see umber.] Same as umber, 3.

Knells downe to the cors, and caught it in armes, Kasty up his umbrere, and kysses hyme sone!

Morte Arthur (E. E. T. S.), i. 3953.

But the brave Mayd would not disarmed bee,
But onely vented up her umbrere,
And so did let her goodly visage to appeere.

Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 42.

umbrette (um-bret'), n. [F. ombrette, dim. of ombre, shade.] The umber or umber-bird. See cut under Scopus.

Umbrian (um'bri-an), a. and n. [= F. Ombrien, < L. Umbria, < Umbri, a people of Italy (see def.)] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Umbria, an ancient region of central Italy, and compartenent to of the modern kingdom, or its inhabitants or language.—Umbrian school of painting, one of the chief groups of development in Italian art, which assumed a distinctive character toward the end of the fourteenth century, and was preeminent at the beginning of the sixteenth. Among its most notable masters were Ottaviano Nelli of Gubbio, Gentile da Fabriano, the graceful Piero della Francesca, Perugino (the able master of Raphael), Pinturicchio, and the wonderfully facile and gifted Raphael of Urbino, with the many lesser names which cluster about him.—Umbrian ware, a name formerly given to Italian majolica, from the number of factories of this ware contained within the limits of Umbria.

II. n. 1. One of an ancient Italian people who inhabited Umbria.—2. The language of the Umbrians: it was an Italic tongue, allied to Oscan and more distantly to Latin. Its chief monument is the Engubine tables. See Eugubine.

Umbriidæ (um'bri-dë), n. pl. [NL. < Umbra + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Umbra; the mud-minnows. They are small carnivorous fishes living in the mud, or among the weeds of ponds and sluggish streams, extremely tenacious of life, and able to survive when the water is almost dried up. The relationships of the family are close with the pikes (Esoidea). See minnow, and cut under Umbra.

umbriferet, n. See umbrere.

umbriferous (um-brif'e-rus), a. [L. umbrifer, shade-giving, shady, < umbrä, shade, + ferre = E. bear.] Casting or making a shade. Blount, Glossographia (1670).

umbriferously (um-brif'e-rus-li), adv. So as to make or cast a shade: as, "growing umbriferously." Tyndall.

umbril, n. Same as umber.

Umbrina (um-brä'nä), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Sp. umbrina, < L. umbra, shade, shadow; see umbra.] 1. A genus of sciaenoid fishes, having the dorsals contiguous, the second dorsal much larger than the anal, vertebrae about 10 abdominal and 14 caudal, lower jaw not protruding, hypopharyngeals distinct, a single barbel, an air-bladder, and two anal spines. The type is Sciaenops cirrosa of Linnaeus, now U. cirrosa. Species are found in most warm seas. U. bronzonotus inhabits West Indian and Florida waters. U. roseador, the yellow-finned rounder of the Pacific coast, is one of the handsomest sciaenoids, about 15 inches long.

2. [L. c.] A fish of this genus; an umbra or umbrine.—3. In entom., a genus of dipterous insects. Desroddy, 1830.

umbrine (um'brin), n. [F. umbrine (Cotgrave), < NL. umbrina; see Umbrina.] A fish of the genus Umbrina; an umbra; specifically, U. cirrosa, known to the ancients, now the corvo of the Italians, ranging in the Mediterranean, and southward along the west coast of Africa. See cut under Umbrina.

umbose (um'brös), a. [= F. ombreux = Sp. Pg. umbrös = It. ombroso, < L. umbrösus, full of shade, shady, < umbrä, shade, shadow; see umbra.] 1. Shady; casting a large shadow or heavy shade. Bailey, 1731.—2. In ornith., dusky; dark-colored.—Umbose warbler. See warbler.

umbrosity (um-bros'i-ti), n. [L. as if umbrösitas* (-is), < umbrösus, shady; see umbrösus.] The state or quality of being umbröse; shadiness. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

umiak (üm'yak), n. [Eskimo umiak, also written umiak.] The native name of the women's or larger kind of Eskimo boat, carrying ten or twelve people, and consisting of a wooden frame covered with sealskins, with several seats. It is used for fishing and for transporting families, and is worked by women. It often has a mast and a triangular sail.

umlaut (üm'lout), n. [G. umlaut, modification of vowels, < um, around, about, also indicating change, alteration (see um-), + laut, sound; see loud.] In philol., the German name, invented by Grimm, for a vowel-change in the Germanic languages, brought about by the influence of a vowel in the succeeding syllable; namely, of the vowel i, modifying the preceding vowel in the direction of e or u, and of the vowel u, modifying the preceding vowel toward a or o. Only the former, or the change by a following i (now generally lost or altered), is found in English or German: thus, German man, mauer; fall, fallen; maus, mause; fuss, fusse; etc. In English the phenomena are only sporadic remains, like man, maen; fall, fell; mouse, mice; foot, feet. In Icelandic both kinds of umlaut are frequent and regular changes. An English name sometimes used for 'umlaut' is mutation. Compare abaut.

umlaut (üm'lout), v. t. [Umlaut, n.] In philol., to form with the umlaut, as a form; also, to affect or modify by umlaut, as a sound.

We have the umlauted ä (ä).
The Academy, March 17, 1888, p. 190.

umpirage (üm'pär-ä), n. [Umpire + -age.] The post of an umpire; the act of one who arbitrates as umpire; the decision of an umpire; arbitration.

I gave him the first notice of the Spaniards referring the umpirage of the peace 'twixt them and Portugal to the French King.
Edwyn, Diary, April 11, 1666.

umpire (üm'pär), n. [ME. umpere, owmpere, owmpere (a form due to misdivision of a numper as an umpere); prop. umpere, owmpere, owmpere, owmpier, < OF. umpier*, owmpier, later owmpier, not equal, odd, < um, not, + per (< L. par), equal; see um3 and par2, pair1, per2.] 1. A person to whose sole decision a controversy or question between parties is referred; one agreed upon as a judge, arbiter, or referee in case of conflict of opinions; specifically, a person selected to see that the rules of a game, as cricket or base-ball, are enforced, and to decide disputed or debatable points.

And if ye thinke it to many lerned men, take ze one, and he another; and if they may not accorde, ze and I to be umpire, for we stande bothe in like cas.

Paston Letters, i. 129.

'Twixt my extremes and me this bloody knife Shall play the umpire, 'twixt my 'Sword' and 'I'.

Shak., R. and J., iv. 1. 63.

2. In law, a third person called in to decide a controversy or question submitted to arbitrators when the arbitrators do not agree in opinion.—Syn. 1. Arbitrator, Referee, etc. See judge.

umpire (üm'pär), v. [umpire, n.] 1. To decide as umpire; settle, as a dispute. South, Sermons, VI. ii. [Rare.] Specifically.—2. To enforce the rules of (a game), and decide disputed points: as, to umpire a game of base-ball.

II. intrans. To act as umpire.

We list not to umpire betwixt Geographers, but to relate our Historie.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 328.

umpireship (üm'pär-ship), n. [Umpire + -ship.] The office of an umpire; arbitration; umpirage.

We refuse not the arbitrement and umpireship of the Holy Ghoste.
Bp. Jewel, Def. of Apol., p. 63. (Richardson)

umpress (üm'pres), n. [For umpress*, < umpire + -ess.] A woman who is an umpire; a female umpire. Marston.

umquhile (üm'hwil), adv. and a. A Scotch form of umwhile.

umstroket (üm'strök), n. [um- + stroke.] Boundary line; extreme edge.

Such towns as stand . . . on the very umstroke, or on any part of the utmost line of a map.
Fuller.

umula (ö'mö-lä), n. Eccles., same as moztat.

umwhile (üm'hwil), adv. and a. [See umquhile; < ME. umwhile, umwhyle, umwile, umquile, umbe-while, orig. two words, umbe, while, lit. 'at times,' at some time; umbe, around, about, at; while, time; see um-, umbe, and while.] Formerly; late; whilom. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Scott, Pirate, iv.

un-2. [< ME. un-, on-, < AS. un-, on-, and-, an-, and- (as in un-löcan, unlock, on-bidan, unloose, etc.), a particular use of un-, and-, back, against, = Gi. en-, etc.; see and-, un-2, a-5. This prefix has been more or less confused with un-1, the notion of reversal in the one (AS. un-, on-, etc., 'back') being in many cases practically identical with the notion of negation in the other (AS. un-, 'not'). There are three different senses possible to a form with the prefix in un-2 and the suffix -ed2 — e. g., unarmed may mean (a) 'not now armed' (< un-1 + armed, p. a.); (b) 'not yet armed' (< un-1 + armed, pp.); (c) 'that has been deprived of arms,' 'no longer armed' (pp. of unarm, i. e. < unarm + -ed2). So, unlocked, (a) 'not now locked' (< un-1 + locked, p. a.); (b) 'not yet locked' (< un-1 + locked, pp.); (c) 'no longer locked,' 'open' (pp. of unlock, i. e. < unlock + -ed2); unlearned, (a) 'not learned,' 'ignorant' (< un-1 + learned, a.); (b) 'not yet learned' (< un-1 + learned, pp.); (c) 'no longer learned,' 'rejected' (pp. of unlearn, i. e. < unlearn + -ed2); etc.] An inseparable prefix of verbs (generally transitive), meaning 'back,' and denoting the reversal or annulment of the action of the simple verb: as, undo, unlearn, unbuck, unmake, etc. It is very common as prefixed to verbs made from nouns, implying privation of the object named by the noun, or the qualities connoted by it: as, unarm, unseat, unfrisk, unhallow, unhorse, etc., to take off or deprive of one's arms, seat, frolic, hallow, horse, etc.; unman, unsex, to deprive of the qualities of a man, of sex, etc. When used with verbs denoting an act or process which cannot actually be reversed or undone, it implies retraction: as, to unsay, unswear, undo, etc. Words with this prefix are much confused with words having the prefix un-1 (see etymology). In the following pages words with the prefix un-2 are generally so marked, while words with the prefix un-1 are left without etymological note, except in special cases. See remarks under un-1.

In the extension of space-construction to the infinitely great we must distinguish between unboundedness and infinite extent; the former belonging to the extent relations, the latter to the measure relations. That space is an unbounded three-fold manifoldness is an assumption which is developed by every conception of the outer world; according to which at every instant the region of real perception is completed and the possible positions of a sought object are constructed, and which by these applications is forever confirming itself. The unboundedness of space possesses in this way a greater empirical certainty than any external experience. But its infinite extent by no means follows from this.

Riemann, tr. by Clifford.

unbounden (un-boun'den), a. [< ME. unbunden; pp. of unbîd, v.] Set free; unwedded.

Uncinia (un-sin'i-ā), n. [N.L. (Persoon, 1807), < LL. uncinus, a hook; see uncinus.] A genus of sedges, distinguished from the related genus Carex by the hooked or barbed apex of the rachilla or spikelet-pedice. There are about 25 species, mostly natives of the temperate and cold parts of the southern hemisphere, a few in the Hawaiian Islands, the West Indies, and the mountains of tropical America and Mexico. They are herbs with the habit of those species of Carex which have a simple androgynous continuous inflorescence. See hamulus, 1 (b).

unciniform (un-sin'i-fōrm), a. Uncinate.

Uncinaria (un-sin-i-tā'ri-ā), n. pl. [N.L., < L. uncinatus, hooked: see uncinate.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, a group, called a sub-order, of dictyonine hexactinellidan Silicispongiae, characterized by the presence of uncinate spicules, and divided into two tribes, Clavularia and Scopularia, the former having one family, the latter five.

uncinitarium (un-sin-i-tā'ri-ān), a. [< Uncinaria + -ium.] Having uncinate spicules, as a sponge; of or pertaining to the Uncinaria.

Uncinula (un-sin'ū-ē), n. [N.L. (Léveillé, 1851), < LL. uncinus, a hook; see uncinus.] A genus of parasitic (pyrenomycetous) fungi, of the family Erysiphaceæ, having the appendages free from the mycelium and recurved or coiled at the tip. Each perithecioid contains several asci. U. ampelopsis (U. spiralis) is the common or powdery grape-mildew, and is highly injurious to the grape. See grape-mildew, Erysiphaceæ, Pyrenomyces, and mildew.

uncinus (un-si'nus), n.; pl. uncini (-nī). [< LL. uncinus, a hook, barb.] 1. A hook or hook-let; a hamulus; something small, hard, and crooked; specifically, in conch., one of the uncinal teeth of the radula.

In the Heteropoda, [the radula] is so far more highly developed than the outermost uncinæ of the transverse rows may not only be very long, but also be articulated in such a manner as to be movable. When, therefore, the radula is protruded, these teeth are erected, and when it is drawn back they come together like pincers. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 360.

2. One of the hooked cilia of infusorians.—3. One of the numerous minute chitinous hooks of the tori of some annelids. See Uncinatum.—4. A weapon used in the eleventh century, resembling a martel-de-fer, but thought to have only one point or edge.

unciphert (un-si'fēr), v. t. To decipher.

Which letter was intercepted by Captain Abbot, a Captain of Dragons in the army, and is now unciphert. Rushworth Hist. Coll., II. IV. 1. 491 (1647). (Darvies.)

The spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord.

Isa. xi. 2.

The power of perception is that which we call the understanding. Perception, which we make the act of the understanding, is of three sorts: 1. The perception of ideas in our mind. 2. The perception of the signification of signs. 3. The perception of the connection or repugnancy, agreement or disagreement, that there is between any of our ideas. All these are attributed to the understanding, or perceptive power, though it be the two latter only that use allows us to say we understand.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. § 5.

A spirit is one simple undivided active being: as it perceives ideas, it is called the understanding, as it produces or otherwise operates about them, it is called the will.

Berkeley, Human Knowledge, i. § 27.

3. The representative faculty; the power of abstract thought; the logical power. Kantian writers restrict understanding to the operation of abstract thought concerning objects of possible experience.

And thus we discover a power we have of heightening the colour of our ideas, of changing or directing their course by the application of our notice: and the exercise of this power I take to be what is commonly meant by an act of the understanding.

A. Tucker, Light of Nature, xii. § 1.

As all acts of the understanding can be reduced to judgments, the understanding may be defined as the faculty of judging. For we saw before that the understanding is the faculty of thinking, and thinking is knowledge by means of concepts.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (tr. by Muller), II. 61.

4. Intelligence between two or more persons; agreement of minds; harmony; union of sentiment; also, something mutually understood or agreed upon; as, there was an understanding between them.

unguent (ung'gwent), n. [ME. unguent = F. unguent = Pr. unguent, unguent, unguent = Sp. Pg. It. unguento, < L. unguentum, ointment, < ungere, ungere, smear, anoint, = Skt. añj, smear, anoint. From the L. verb are also ult. E. unction, unctions, oint, anoint, ointment, unction, etc.] Any soft composition used as an ointment or for lubrication.

Have odour like her unguent.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 109.

And tho' your unguent bears th' Athenian Name,

The Woolf's unsav'ry Scent is still the same.

Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

unguentary (ung'gwen-tä-ri), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. unguentario, < L. unguentarius, of or pertaining to ointment, < unguentum, ointment; see unguent.] Of or pertaining to unguents.—Unguentary vase, a small vase for unguents.

unguentor (ung-gwen'tō), n. [It. unguento; see unguent.] An unguent.

"Tis this blessed unguent, this rare extraction, that hath only power to disperse all malignant humours.

B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 1.

unguentous (ung-gwen'tus), a. [un-1 + unguent + -ous]. Like an unguent, or partaking of its qualities. [Rare.]

ungues, n. Plural of unguis.

ungessed (ung-gest'), a. Not arrived at or attained by guess or conjecture; unsuspected. Spenser.

And there by night and there by day

The worm ungessed and greedily lay.

Bulwer, tr. of Schiller's Fight with the Dragon, p. 73.

unguical (ung'gwi-kál), a. [L. unguis, nail, claw, + -ic-al]. Like a nail or claw; ungular; ungular. [Rare.]

unguicular (ung'gwi-körn), n. [L. unguis, nail, claw, hook, + cornu, horn]. In ornith., the horny sheath of the tip of the upper mandible, when distinct from the rest of the pieces composing the sheath of the bill, as it is in ducks, geese, petrels, etc.; the derotrochea. The inferior unguicular is the corresponding sheath of the tip of the under mandible. Also called myrotheca.

The unguicular or derotrochea is large and strong (in the albatross). Coues, Proc. Phila. Acad., 1895, p. 270.

unguicular (ung-gwik'ü-lär), a. [L. unguiculus, dim. of unguis, nail, claw, + -ar]. 1. Of or pertaining to a nail or claw; bearing claws; ungular.—2. Of the length of an unguis or human finger-nail; about half an inch long. Unguicular joint of the tarsus, in entom., the last tarsal joint, to which the unguis are attached.

Unguiculata (ung-gwik'ü-lä'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of unguiculatus; see unguiculate]. In the Linnean classification, one of the primary divisions, a subclass or superorder, of the Mammalia, including the four orders Bruta, Glires, Fera, and Primates, or the edentates, rodents, carnivores, and quadrumanes (including man); correlated with Ungulata, or hoofed quadrupeds, and the cetaceans. [Not now used in any exact classificatory sense, though available as a designation.]

unguiculate (ung-gwik'ü-lät), a. and n. [= F. unguiculé = Sp. unguiculado, < NL. unguiculatus, < L. unguiculus, nail, claw; see unguiculus]. 1. a. 1. Having nails or claws, as distinguished from hoofs; not ungulate nor muticous, as a mammal; belonging to the Unguiculata.—2. In bot., furnished with a claw or claw-like base; clawed; said of petals; also, ending in a point like a claw.—3. In entom., hooked, as if clawed.—Unguiculate antennæ or palpi, antennæ or palpi in which the last joint is slender and curved, resembling a claw.—Unguiculate maxillæ, subchelate maxillæ, whose lacinia or external lobe has at its apex a slender tooth which can be folded down on the lobe itself, as in the Cicindlidae.—Unguiculate tibia, in entom., a tibia which has the external apical angle prolonged in a more or less incurved and pointed process; distinguished from the microneurata tibia, in which there is a similar prolongation on the inner side.

II. n. A member of the Unguiculata. unguiculated (ung-gwik'ü-lät-ed), a. [un-1 + unguiculate + -ed]. Same as unguiculate. unguiculus (ung-gwik'ü-lus), n.; pl. unguiculi (-li). [NL., < L. unguiculus, dim. of unguis, nail, claw; see unguis.] In entom., an unguis; a small claw or hook-like appendage. Sometimes used to distinguish either tarsal claw, when both claws and the last tarsal joint are collectively called unguis. See unguis, 4.

unguidable (un-gü'dä-bl), a. Incapable of being guided.

unguidably (un-gü'dä-bli), adv. In an unguidable manner. Carlyle.

unguided (un-gü'ded), a. 1. Not guided; not led or conducted.

A stranger

Unguided and unfriended.

Shak., T. N., iii. 3. 10.

2. Not regulated; ungoverned.

The accidental, unguided notions of blind matter.

Locke.

unguiferous (ung-gwif'e-rus), a. [L. unguis, nail, claw, + ferre = E. bear]. 1. Bearing an unguis of any kind; as, the terminal or unguiferous phalanx of a digit.—2. Having unguiferous phalanges or digits; ungular; or ungulate, as a quadruped. Unguiferous prolegs, in entom., those false or deciduous legs of a caterpillar which are armed beneath with many minute hooks.

unguiform (ung'gwi-fôrm), a. [= F. onguiforme; < L. unguis, nail, claw, + forma, form.] Shaped like a claw; hooked; uneiform.—Unguiform mandibles, in cutom., mandibles which are long, parallel sided, and curved downward, as in the larvae of many Diptera.

unguiltily (un-gil'ti-li), adv. Not guiltily; innocently.

unguiltiness (un-gil'ti-nes), n. The character or state of being unguiltly or innocent; innocence.

Your conscience knows my heart's unguiltiness.

Chapman, Alphonsus, Emperor of Germany, v. 2.

unguiltly (un-gil'ti), a. [ME. ungultly, ungultly (also, with F. term, ungiltif), < AS. ungultig, not guilty; as un-1 + guiltly.] Not guilty; innocent. Wyclif.

unguinal (ung'gwi-nal), a. [= Sp. unguinal, < L. unguis, nail, claw; see unguis.] Of or pertaining to the unguis, or human nail. [Rare.]

Dr.—reports a case of reproduction of the entire unguinal phalanx of the thumb by a single bone-graft. (Pacific Med. Jour.) Pap. Sci. News, XXIII, 143.

unguinous (ung'gwi-nus), a. [L. unguinus, full of fat or oil; < ungere, ungere, smear, anoint; see ungere.] Oily; unctuous; consisting of fat or oil, or resembling it.

unguistroal (ung'gwi-ros'tral), a. [L. unguis, nail, claw, + rostrum, beak.] Having a nail at the end of the bill, as a duck or goose.

Unguistrostres (ung'gwi-ros'trés), n. pl. [NL.; see anguistrostres.] In ornith., in Nitzsch's classification, the duck family; so called from the nail at the end of the bill; equivalent to the Lamellirostres or Anseres of authors, exclusive of the flamingos.

unguis (ung'gwis), n.; pl. ungues (-gwéz). [NL., < L. unguis, nail, claw, talon, hoof, = Gr. ὄνυξ, nail, claw; see nail and onx.] 1. A nail, claw, or hoof of any animal.—2†. A measure of length, about half an inch.—3. In anat.: (a) The human lacrymal bone; so called because it resembles the human finger-nail; more fully called os unguis. (b) The hippocampus minor, or calcar, of the brain. Also unguis aris, unguis Halleri.—4. In cutom., one of the curved claws at the extremity of an insect's tarsus. Generally there are two of these on each tarsus, but they may be united; sometimes there is a projection or claw-like organ, the only limb or empodium, between the true claws. The unguis are attached to a very small piece, which, according to Huxley, is a true joint, though the preceding joint is generally called the last of the tarsus; this piece may be expanded beneath into a cushion-like organ, the pulvillus. Some entomologists apply the term unguis to the last tarsal joint, including the two claws, which are then distinguished as unguiculi. The unguis assume various forms, which are of great importance in classification. The two claws may be more or less united or connate, even nearly to the tips. When forming only a slight angle with each other they are said to be divergent, and when spreading widely they are said to be divaricate. They are cleft when each claw is split from the tip so that there is an upper and a lower division; unequally cleft when these divisions are of unequal size; cleft with movable parts when the divisions are movable on each other; bifid when the divisions are side by side instead of one over the other. According to the processes on the lower or concave surface, unguis are toothed when each has one pointed process; serrate when there are several small pointed teeth; serrulate when these processes are fine and bristle-like; peracute when they are long, slender, and numerous; appendiculate when each claw has a membranous appendage beneath. The claws may be unequal in size; and when they can be turned back on the last tarsal joint they are said to be subchela.

5. In bot., the claw or lower contracted part of some petals, by which they are attached to the receptacle, as in the pink, the mustard, Clematis, etc. It is analogous to the petiole of a leaf. Also ungula. See cut under claw.

ungula (ung'gū-lā), n.; pl. ungulae (-lā). [NL., < L. ungula, claw, talon, hoof, dim. of unguis, nail, claw, talon, hoof; see unguis.] 1. A slightly hooked or blunt nail—that is, a hoof, as of the horse, ox, etc.; also, a claw or nail of any kind; a talon.—2. In geom., a part cut off from a cylinder, cone, etc., by a plane passing obliquely through the base and part of the curved surface; so named from its resemblance to the hoof of a horse.—3. In surg., an instrument for extracting a dead fetus from the womb.—4. In bot., same as unguis, 5.—5. [rap.] [NL. (Pander, 1830).] A genus of brachiopods; same as Obolus, 3. and Ungulites.

ungular (ung'gū-lār), a. [L. ungula + -ar.] Of the character of an ungula; ungual.

Ungulata (ung'gū-lā'tij), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. ungulatus, having claws or hoofs; see ungulate.] In the Linnean classification, one of the primary divisions, a subclass or superorder, of Mammalia, including all the hoofed quadrupeds, the two Linnean orders Pecora and Bellua (except the elephant and walrus, which Linnaeus placed in Bruta, an order of his Unguiculata). The Ungulata were thus nearly equivalent to the orders Pachydermata, Solidunguli, and Ruminantia, and correspond to the modern orders Artiodactyla (the ruminants, pigs, and hippopotamuses) and Perissodactyla (horses, tapirs, and rhinoceroses), together with the Proboscidea and Hyacivoridae, and certain fossil groups, as the Amblypoda. The term, like the correlated Unguiculata, has lapsed from a strict classificatory sense, but is still used as a convenient designation of hoofed quadrupeds collectively or indiscriminately.

ungulate (ung'gū-lāt), a. and n. [L. ungulatus, having claws or hoofs, < L. ungula, claw, talon, hoof; see ungula, unguis.] 1. a. 1. Shaped or formed into a hoof; hoof-like; ungulons.—2. Hoofed, as a quadruped, like the horse, ox, etc.; belonging to the Ungulata. See bisulcate, multungulate, solidungulate, subungulate.

II. n. An ungulate or hoofed quadruped. unguled (ung'gūld), a. In her., having hoofs; noting ruminant animals. The epithet is used only when the hoofs are of a different tincture from the rest of the bearing.

Unguligrada (ung'gū-lig'rā-dij), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of unguligradus; see unguligrade.] A division of ruminant ungulates; the ruminants proper, exclusive of the Camelidae; the Pecora unguligrada, contrasted as a series with the Pecora tylopoda or Phalangigrada, the latter including only the camel family. Also Unguligrada.

unguligrade (ung'gū-li-grād), a. and n. [NL. unguligradus, < L. ungula, hoof, + gradus, walk.] 1. a. Walking upon hoofs; having true hoofs; cloven-footed, as a ruminant, or solidungulate, as the horse; belonging to the Unguligrada; not phalangigrade or tylopod.

II. n. An unguligrade quadruped.

Ungulina (ung'gū-lī-nij), n. [NL. (Bosco, or Oken, 1815), dim. of L. ungula, claw, hoof; see ungula.] A genus of bivalves, typical of the family Ungulinidae, whose few species are African, and live on coral.

ungulite (ung'gū-lit), n. A brachiopod of the genus Ungulites (or Obolus).

ungulite-grit (ung'gū-lit-grit), n. A division of the Lower Silurian, extending from near Lake Ladoga to beyond Reval on the Gulf of Finland, and characterized by the presence of so-called ungulites (Obolus apollinis), one of the characteristic brachiopods of the primordial fauna. So named by Pander.

Ungulites (ung'gū-lī'téz), n. [NL. (Brom, 1848), < L. ungula, a hoof.] A genus of brachiopods; same as Obolus, 3. Also Ungula.

ungulous (ung'gū-lus), a. [L. ungula, hoof, + -ous.] Pertaining to or resembling a hoof; ungulate.

ungum (un-gum'), v. t. [un-2 + gum.] To remove gum from; free from gum or a gummy substance, or from stickiness; degum.

When ungummed, bleached, and combed, it [ramie] forms the strong brilliant staple now used in the manufacture of Japanese silks.

Brownell, Wool-Carding, p. 67.

ungyve (un-jiv'), v. t. [un-2 + gyre.] To free from fetters or handcuffs. [Rare.]

Commanded him to be ungyved and set at liberty.

Sir T. Elgot, The Governor, ii. 6.

unhabile† (un-hab'il), a. [un-1 + habile. Cf. unable.] Unfit; unsuitable.

Puttyng out of their cite their women and all that were of yeres unhabill for the warres, . . . they [the Petiliams] obstinately defended their walls.

Sir T. Elgot, The Governor, iii. 6.

unhabitable (un-hab'i-ta-bl), a. Uninhabitable. [Obsolete or rare.]

We offer unto yowe the Equinoctial line hetherto unknown and burnt by the furious heate of the sonne, and unhabitable after the opinion of the owle wyrters, a few excepted.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books in America, [ed. Arber, p. 64].

Hitherto they had all the like opinion, that vnder the bare Equinoctial for much heate the land was unhabitable.

Hall's Voyages, i. 219.

unhacked (un-hakt'), a. Not hacked; not cut or mangled; not notched.

With unhacked swords and helmets all unbruised,

We will bear home that lusty blood again.

Shak., K. John, ii. 1. 254.

unhackneyed (un-hak'nid), a. Not hackneyed; not worn out or rendered stale, flat, or commonplace by frequent use or repetition.

unhair (un-hār'), v. [ME. unheiren; < un-2 + hair.] 1. trans. To deprive of hair; remove the hair from; depilate; as, to unhair skins or hides. Wyclif, Ezek. xxix. 18.

I'll unhair thy head. Shak., A. and C., ii. 5. 61.

Screens of willow matting or unhairs skins.

Morgan, Contrib. to American Ethnology, p. 127.

II. intrans. To become free from hair.

The hide is said to unhair in 24 hours.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 370.

unhairing-beam (un-hār'ing-bēm), n. In leather-manuf., a semicylindrical beam resting on a support at one end and on the floor at the other, so that it has an inclined position; used to support the hides as they come from the lime-pits, and to hold them for treatment with the unhairing-knife.

unhairing-knife (un-hār'ing-nif), n. In leather-manuf., a two-handled iron scraper used to scrape the hair from hides after they are taken from the lime-pits. Compare unhairing-beam.

unhairing-machine (un-hār'ing-mā-shēn'), n. A machine for removing the hair from hides. It consists of two cylinders between which the hides are passed, one cylinder carrying spiral scrapers, and the other below it caused, by suitable gearing, to revolve at a less speed.

unhalet (un-hāl'), a. [un-1 + hale. Cf. unwhole.] Unsound; not healthy. Waterhouse, Apology for Learning.

unhalesomet, a. Same as unwholesome.

unhallow (un-hal'ō), v. t. To profane; desecrate.

Aevorth chyrche unhallowed was, thernor hym was wo.

Robert of Gloucester, p. 349.

unicamerate (ū-ni-kam'e-rāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + camera, a chamber, + -ate.] Having one chamber or loculus; unilocular.

unicapsular (ū-ni-kap'sū-lār), a. [< L. unus, one, + capsula, capsule, + -ar.] Having a single capsule; specifically, monocytarian, as a radiolarian.

unicarinate (ū-ni-kar'i-nāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + carina, keel, + -ate.] Same as unicarinated.

unicarinated (ū-ni-kar'i-nāt), a. [< unicarinate + -ed.] Having but one ridge or keel.

unicellate (ū-ni-sel'āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + cella, a cell, + -ate.] One-pronged, as a sponge-spicule.

unicelled (ū-ni-sel'd), a. [As unicell(ate) + -ed.] Unicellular.

unicellular (ū-ni-sel'ū-lār), a. [< L. unus, one, + cellula, a cell, + -ar.] Consisting of a single cell, as some infusorians and some cryptogams; pertaining to or exhibiting only a single cell, as most of the protozoan animals and protophytic plants, and the undeveloped ova of all metazoan animals. Most unicellular structures or organisms are microscopic, but many attain considerable size, preserving their unicellular state notwithstanding the addition of adventitious protoplasmic material, as the eggs of birds or reptiles. See cut under Protozoa. Also monocellular—Unicellular animals, the Protozoa.

unicentral (ū-ni-sen'tral), a. [< L. unus, one, + centrum, center, + -al.] Having a single center (of growth), as an animal; proceeding from a center in all directions, as growth or development. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., i. 134.

unichord (ū-ni-kōrd), n. Same as monochord.

uniciliate (ū-ni-sil'i-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL cilium + -ate.] 1. Having one cilium; unilagellate. Micros. Sci., XXIX. 348.—2. In bot., having one cilium or hair-like process: as, a uniciliate bacterium.

uniciliated (ū-ni-sil'i-āt), a. Same as uniciliate.

unicism (ū-ni-sizm), n. In med., the doctrine that there is but one venereal virus producing chancre, as opposed to dualism, which teaches that there are two forms of venereal ulcer, due to the action of distinct specific poisons, one being followed by syphilis and the other not.

unicist (ū-ni-sist), n. In med., a believer in unicism.

unicity (ū-nis'i-ti), n. [< L. unicus, one only (see unic, unique) (< unus, one), + -ity.] 1. The state of being unique; uniqueness. [Rare.]—2. The state of being in unity, or of being united into one. De Quincy. [Rare.]

uniclinal (ū-ni-kl'i-nāl), a. [< L. unus, one, + Gr. klēvō, slope, bend (see eline), + -al.] Same as monoclinal.

unicolor, unicolor (ū-ni-kul'or), a. [< L. unicolor, having one color, < unus, one, + color, color; see color.] Of but one color; whole-colored. Also unicolorous.

unicolorate (ū-ni-kul'or-āt), a. [< unicolor + -ate.] Same as unicolor.

unicolored, unicoloured (ū-ni-kul'or-d), a. [< unicolor + -ed.] Same as unicolor. Tr. Dict., III. 849.

unicolorous (ū-ni-kul'or-us), a. [< unicolor + -ous.] Same as unicolor.

Uniconchæ (ū-ni-kōng'kē), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), < L. unus, one, + concha, a shell.] The univalve shells collectively.

uniconstant (ū-ni-kon'stant), a. Characterized or defined by one constant only.

Lamé adopted the molecular theory which leads to uniconstant isotropy, but expresses his results by inconstant formulas. Amer. Jour. Sci., XXXIX. 337.

unicorn (ū-ni-kōrn), n. [< ME. unicorn, unycorne, < OF. (and F.) unicorn, < LL. unicornus (also called monoceros, < Gr. μονόκερως), a fabulous one-horned animal, the unicorn, < L. unicornis, one-horned, < unus, one, + cornu, horn, = E. horn.] 1. A traditional or fabulous animal, with a single long horn, the monoceros of classic writers, commonly described as a native of India, but in terms not certainly applicable to any known animal. It is supposed that one of the several large antelopes may have furnished the basis of fact of accounts, since the long straight or recurved horns viewed in profile would appear single. See def. 3.

In that Centre bene many white Olifantes with outen nombre, and of Unicornes, and of Lyons of many maneres, and many of such Bestes, that I have told before, and of many other hydouse Bestes with outen nombre. Mandeville, Travels, p. 298.

The roots of Mandioca had almost killed them all, but by a peecce of Unicornes horne they were preserved.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 841.

2. A mistranslation in the authorized version of the Bible (Deut. xxxiii. 17, and elsewhere) of the Hebrew word re'em. This named a two-horned animal, which has been supposed to be the urus. In the revised version the word is translated wild ox.

3. In her., the representation of the fabulous animal used as a bearing. It is delineated as a horse, but with the tail of a lion and a long straight horn growing out of the forehead between the ears; often the hoofs are represented as cloven. The actual animal most like this bearing is the gan.

4. The unicorn-fish, unicorn-whale, sea-unicorn, or narwhal, whose enormously long single incisor tooth projects like a horn. See Monodon, monoceros, 3.—5. The kamichi or horned screamer, Palamedea cornuta; the unicorn-bird. N. Gree. See cut under Palamedea.—6. A kind of beetle having a single long horn; a unicorn-beetle. Various large beetles literally answer to this definition, being unicorns, with a large single prothoracic horn. See Dynastes, elephant-beetle, Hercules-beetle.

7. In conch., a unicorn-shell. See cut under Monoceros.—8. A pair of horses with a third horse in front; also, the whole equipage.

Let me drive you out some day in my unicorn.

Miss Edgeworth, Helinda, xvii.

9. A Scottish gold coin issued by James III., James IV., and James V., having the figure of Obverse.

Reverse.

Unicorn, James III.—British Museum. (Size of original.)

a unicorn on the obverse. Its standard weight was 58.89 grains troy, and it was current for 23 shillings Scotch.—10. [cap.] In astron., the constellation Monoceros.

unicorn-beetle (ū-ni-kōrn-bē'tl), n. Same as unicorn, 6.

unicorn-bird (ū-ni-kōrn-bērd), n. Same as unicorn, 5.

unicorneal (ū-ni-kōr'nē-āl), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. cornea, cornea, + -al.] Having but one cornea, as an ocellus or simple eye of an insect.

The unicorneal ocelli are principally present in larval life. Claus, Zoology (trans.), p. 538.

unicorn-fish (ū-ni-kōrn-fish), n. The narwhal. See univertu, 4.

unicorn-moth (ū-ni-kōrn-mōth), n. A North American bombycid moth, of the family Notodontidae, Cyclodasys unicornis; so called from the horn on the dorsum of the first abdominal segment of its larva. Also called unicorn prominent.

Unicorn moth (Cyclodasys unicornis).

Larva of Unicorn-moth.

unicornous (ū-ni-kōr'nus), a. [< L. unicornis, one-horned; see unicorn.] 1. Having only one horn: as, unicornous beetles. Sir T. Bracon, Vulg. Err., v. 19.—2. Extended into but one oviducal process, as a womb. See uterus unicornis.

unicorn-plant (ū-ni-kōrn-plant), n. See Martynia.

unicorn-root (ū-ni-kōrn-rōt), n. The blazing-star, Alectris farinosa. The false unicorn-root is Chamaetrium Carolinianum (Helonias dioica), also called devil-bit and crooping starwort. Its root is difficult to distinguish from that of the former, and some medical virtues are also ascribed to it. Also unicorn's-horn.

unicorn-shell (ū-ni-kōrn-shell), n. A gastropod of the family Muricidae, the lip of whose shell has one large spine like a horn, as of the genus Monoceros. See cut under Monoceros.

unicorn's-horn (ū-ni-kōrnz-hōrn), n. Same as unicorn-root.

unicornuted (ū-ni-kōr-nū'ted), a. [< L. unus, one, + cornutus, horned; see cornute.] Decorated with one horn: said of a helmet or other object which usually has two horns.

unicorn-whale (ū-ni-kōrn-hwāl), n. The narwhal. See unicorn, 4.

unicostate (ū-ni-kos'tāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + costa, a rib; see costate.] 1. Having but one rib; in bot., noting those leaves which have one large vein running down the center, called the midrib. Those having more than one great division are called multicostate.—2. In zool., having a single costa, rib, or nervure, as an insect's wing.

unicotyledonous (ū-ni-kot'i-lō'don-us), a. In bot., having one cotyledon; monocotyledonous.

unicursal (ū-ni-kūr'sāl), a. [< L. unus, one, + cursus, course; see course.] On one path of a moving element.—Unicursal curve, a curve which can be expressed as the locus of a point defined by rational functions of a single parameter. Not every multipartite curve is unicursal, because, though such a curve may be expressed in terms of a single parameter, it may be only by means of an irrational function having but one real value; but such curves are only of odd orders. A unicursal curve may have several branches, owing to its passing through infinity.

unicuspid (ū-ni-kus'pid), a. and n. I. a. Having but one cusp, as an incisor or canine tooth; unicuspitate: correlated with bicuspid and multicuspid or pluricuspid.

II. n. A unicuspitate tooth.

unicuspidate (ū-ni-kus'pi-dāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + cuspid (cuspid-), point; see cusp.] Unicuspitate. W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 403.

unicycle (ū-ni-sī-kl), n. [< L. unus, one, + Gr. κύκλος, wheel; see cycle.] A vehicle with only one wheel: a form of velocipede.

unidactyl, unidactyle (ū-ni-dak'til), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + Gr. δακτύλος, digit; see dactyl.] I. a. Having a single (functional) digit, as the horse; monodactyl; unidigitate.

II. n. A unidigitate or monodactyl animal.

unidactylous (ū-ni-dak'ti-lus), a. [< unidactyl + -ous.] Same as unidactyl.

unidead (un-i-dē'ad), a. Having no ideas or thoughts; not intelligent; senseless; frivolous.

Pretty unidead girls . . . seem to form the beau ideal of our whole sex in the works of some modern poets.

Mrs. Hemans (Memorials by Churley, i. 293). (Davies.)

unideal (un-i-dē'āl), a. 1. Not ideal; unimaginative; realistic; material; coarse.

This unideal character mark his style of writing, which is commonly formal, stiff, and rather plain.

Theo. Parker, Historic Americans, Washington.

Unideal works of art (the studious production of which is termed realism) represent actual existing things, and are good or bad in proportion to the perfection of the representation. Ruskin, Modern Painters, iii. 13, § 2.

2. Having no ideas; destitute of ideas, thoughts, or mental action. Johnson. [Rare.]

unidealism (un-i-dē'al-izm), n. [< unideal + -ism.] The quality or state of being unideal; realism; lack of imagination; prosaicism.

His popularity is an emphatic testimony to the singular unidealism I had almost written the congenital inability — of the English mind in respect of eternal and divine things. Fortnightly Review, N. S., XLIII. 80.

unidentate (ū-ni-dēn'tāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + dentatus, toothed; see dentate.] In bot. and zool., having a single tooth or tooth-like projection.

undenticulate (ū-ni-dēn'tik'ū-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. denticulus, denticle, + -at.] In bot. and zool., having but one denticle. Trans. Roy. Soc. of Edin., XXXII. 637.

unidigitate (ū-ni-dij'i-tāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + digitatus, fingered; see digitate.] Having but one finger or toe; monodactylous.

unidimensional (ū-ni-di-men'shon-al), a. Having only one dimension; varying in only one way.

unidirectional (ū-ni-dī-rek'shon-al), a. [< L. unus, one, + directio(-us), direction, + -al.] In elect., noting currents which flow in the same direction round a circuit.

uniembryonic (ū-ni-em-bri-on'ik), a. In bot., having a single embryo.

unifacial (ū-ni-fā'shal), a. [< L. unus, one, + facies, a face, + -al.] Having only one face, front, or aspect; all facing the same way, as the polypites of some corals; unifarious; semid. See cut under sea-kidney.

unifarious (ū-ni-fā'ri-us), a. [< L. unus, one, + -farus as in bifarious, etc.; see bifarious, multifarious.] Set in one rank, row, or series; uniserial; not bifarious or multifarious.

unifiable (ū-ni-fī-ā-bl), a. [< unify + -able.] Capable of being unified or made one. S. Louier, The English Novel, p. 147.

unific (ū-ni-fī'ik), a. [< L. unus, one, + -ficus, < facere, make. Cf. unify.] Making one; forming unity; unifying.

unification (ū-ni-fī-kā'shon), n. [= F. unification = Sp. unificación; < ML. "unificatio(n)-, < unificare, make one; see unify.] The act of unifying, or the state of being unified; the act of uniting into one.

The view of reason here taken is opposed to all such views as would make it consist in the logical principle of unity, a principle compelling us to unify all our conceptions, leading, with Kant, up to the three Ideas of the Pure Reason, God, the World, and the Soul. This unification is sufficiently provided for by the principle of Parsimony, and the facts on which it rests. S. H. Hodge, Time and Space, § 64.

unifier (ū-ni-fī-ēr), n. [< unify + -er.] One who or that which unifies.

That History of Culture itself, which is the great unifier and justifier and purifier of all our teaching. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 202.

unifilar (ū-ni-fī-lār), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + filum, a thread, + -ar.] 1. a. Having only one thread; specifically applied to a magnetometer consisting of a magnetic bar suspended by a single thread. See magnetometer. 2. n. A unifilar magnetometer.

uniflagellate (ū-ni-flaj'e-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. flagellum + -at.] Having a single flagellum; monostagiate, as an infusorian. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., xi. § 419.

uniflorous (ū-ni-flō'rus), a. [< L. unus, one, + flos (flor-), a flower, + -ous.] In bot., bearing one flower only; as, a uniflorous peduncle.

unifoil (ū-ni-fōil), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + folium, a leaf; see foil.] 1. a. In her., having but one leaf; noting a plant used as a bearing. 2. n. In her., a leaf used as a bearing; especially, a leaf represented as having been a dufoil, one leaf being torn away.

unifoliar (ū-ni-fō-lī-ār), a. Same as unifoliate.

unifoliate (ū-ni-fō-lī-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + folium, a leaf; see foliate.] 1. In bot., one-leaved; unifoliar. — 2. Same as unifoliate.

unifoliolate (ū-ni-fō-lī-ō-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. foliolum, a leaflet; see foliolate.] Compound in structure, yet having but one leaflet, as the orange-tree.

unifolium (ū-ni-fō-lī-um), n.; pl. unifolia (-ā). [< L. unus, one, + folium, leaf.] A quartic oval having a single depression.

Unifolium (ū-ni-fō-lī-um), n. [< NL. (Adanson, 1763), so named because the original species, U. bifolium, was seemingly one-leaved; ML.

unifolium, < L. unus, one, + folium, leaf.] A former genus of plants, of the order Liliacea, including Smilacina and Maianthemum.

uniforate (ū-ni-fō'rāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + foratus, pp. of forare, bore, pierce; see foramen.] Having one opening, pore, or foramen.

uniform (ū-ni-fōrm), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + Sp. Pg. It. uniforme, < L. uniformis, having only one shape or form, < unus, one, + form, form, shape. Cf. biform, triform, multiform.] 1. n. = D. G. Sw. Dan. uniform, < F. uniforme = Sp. Pg. It. uniforme, uniform dress; from the adj. 1. a. 1. Having always the same form; not changing in shape, appearance, character, etc.; in general, not variable; unchanging.

All human bodies, for example, though each of them consists of almost an infinite number of parts, are perfectly uniform in their structure and functions. Brattle, Moral Science, ii. 1.

The experience has been uniform that it is the gentle soul that makes the firm hero after all. Emerson, Harvard Commemoration.

(a) Not varying in degree or rate; equable; invariable; as, a uniform heat; a uniform motion (that is, the motion of a body when it passes over equal spaces in equal times).

They [temperature observations] appear to go far to establish a nearly uniform temperature for abyssal depths, not far from the freezing-point of fresh water. C. Wyville Thomson, Depths of the Sea, p. 359.

(b) Having only one character throughout; homogeneous.

Sometimes there are many parts of a law, and sometimes it is uniform, and hath in it but one duty. Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, iii. 6.

(c) Consistent at all times; not different.

If the Creator is perfect, his action must be uniform; anything else would be unworthy of him. Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 31.

(d) Not different at different times or places; applicable to all places, or to all divisions of a country: as, a uniform tax; a uniform bankruptcy law. (e) Of the same appearance, pattern, or style.

The practice of clothing soldiers by regiments in one uniform dress was not introduced by Louis XIV. till 1665, and did not become general in our army for many years afterward. Harper's Mag., LXXX. 333.

2. Of the same form or character with others; agreeing with each other; conforming to one rule or mode.

The only doubt is about the manner of their unity, how far churches are bound to be uniform in their ceremonies. Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Uniform acceleration. See acceleration (b). — Uniform current, a continuous current of constant strength. — Uniform extension, field, function, sandpiper, symmetry, etc. See the nouns. — Uniform strain. Same as homogeneous strain (which see, under strain). — Syn. Unvarying, unchanging, alike, regular, constant, unvarying, consistent.

II. n. A dress of the same kind, fabrics, fashion, or general appearance as others worn by the members of the same body, whether military, naval, or any other, by which the members may be recognized as belonging to the particular body: opposed to plain clothes, or ordinary civil dress; as, the uniform of a soldier, a sailor, or a policeman.

The uniforms in the army were plain and serviceable; the most picturesque being that of the Grenadiers, who, Evelyn says, were first introduced in 1678. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 202.

The proposed uniform, sir, of the Pickwick Club. Dickens.

uniform (ū-ni-fōrm), v. t. [< uniform. a.] 1. To make uniform; reduce to uniformity. Sir P. Sidney.

The more than Protean travesties which words underwent before they were uniformed by Johnson and Walker. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 351.

2. To clothe with or as if with a uniform.

This was the first flag bearing the state arms, and was carried by the first uniformed company of militia in the State [Michigan]. Preble, Hist. Flag, p. 642.

uniformal (ū-ni-fōr'mal), a. [< uniform + -al.] Uniform; symmetrical.

Her comely nose with uniformal grace, Like purest white, stands in the middle place. Herrick, Appendix, p. 433.

uniformitarian (ū-ni-fōr-mi-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [< uniform + -arian.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to uniformity or the doctrine of uniformity. See the noun.

The catastrophist and the uniformitarian opinions. Whewell, Hist. of Scientific Ideas, II. 281.

The uniformitarian theories of Sir Charles Lyell were regarded as heresies by many. Westminster Rev., CXXVI. 544.

II. n. One who upholds a system or doctrine of uniformity; specifically, in geol., one who advocates the theory that causes now active in bringing about geological changes have always been similar in character and intensity, or, in other words, that there has been no essential change in the character of geological events during the lapse of the geological ages: the opposite of catastrophist.

The Catastrophist constructs Theories, the Uniformitarian demolishes them. The former adduces evidence of an Origin, the latter explains the evidence away. Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I, p. xxxvi.

uniformitarianism (ū-ni-fōr-mi-tā'ri-an-izm), n. [< uniformitarian + -ism.] The theory advocated by uniformitarians: the opposite of catastrophism. See catastrophe, 3, and catastrophism.

The changes of the past must be investigated in the light of similar changes now in operation. This was the guiding principle of the Scottish School, . . . though under the name of Uniformitarianism it has unquestionably been pushed to an unwarrantable length by some of the later followers of Hutton. Geikie, Geol. Sketches, p. 293.

uniformity (ū-ni-fōr'mi-ti), n. [= F. uniformité = Sp. uniformidad = Pg. uniformidade = It. uniformità, < LL. uniformitas (t-s), uniformity, < L. uniformis, uniform; see uniform.] The state or character of being uniform, in any sense; absence of variation or difference. (a) Maintenance of the same character, course, plan, laws, etc.; sameness; consistency.

There is no uniformity in the design of Spenser; he aims at the accomplishment of no one action. Dryden.

Queen Elizabeth was remarkable for that steadiness and uniformity which ran through all her actions. Addison.

How far away is the doctrine of uniformity [in nature] from fatalism! It begins directly to remind us that men suffer from preventible evils, that the people perisheth for lack of knowledge. W. K. Clifford, Lect., II. 263.

We see that only as fast as the practice of the arts develops the idea of measure can the consciousness of uniformity become clear. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol. (2d ed.), § 488.

(b) Conformity among several or many to one pattern, plan, rule, etc.; resemblance, consonance, or agreement; as, the uniformity of different churches in ceremonies or rites.

Houses are built to live in, and not to look on; therefore let use be preferred before uniformity, except where both may be had. Bacon, Building.

Such is the uniformity of almost all the houses of the same street . . . that they are made alike both in proportion of workmanship and matter. Coryat, Crudities, I. 30.

The skillful campaign by which the triumph of the Reformation and of uniformity was secured. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

(c) Continued or unvaried sameness or likeness; monotony.

Uniformity must tire at last, though it is a uniformity of excellence. Johnson.

Acts of Uniformity. See act.

uniformize (ū-ni-fōrm-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. uniformized, ppr. uniformizing. [< uniform + -ize.] To make uniform; unify. [Rare.]

The other Congress expressed a similar wish for the formation of . . . an International Commission to fix units and uniformize methods. Nature, XL. 563.

uniformly (ū-ni-fōrm-lī), adv. In a uniform manner; with uniformity; evenly; invariably.

In a light drab he uniformly dressed. Crabbe, Tales (Works, IV. 135).

No assigned nor any conceivable attribute of the supposed archetypal vertebra is uniformly maintained. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol. (Am. ed. 1872), § 210.

When the simultaneous values of a quantity for different bodies or places are equal, the quantity is said to be uniformly distributed in space. Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, xxiii., foot-note.

Uniformly accelerated motion. See acceleration (b). — Uniformly retarded motion. See retard.

uniformness (ū-ni-fōrm-nes), n. The state or character of being uniform; uniformity. Berkley.

unifoveate (ū-ni-fō'vō-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + fovea, a small pit; see foveate.] In bot., having a single fovea.

unify (ū-ni-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. unified, ppr. unifying. [< F. unifier = Sp. unificar = It. unificare, < ML. unificare, make one, < L. unus, one, + facere, make; see -fy. Cf. unific.] 1. trans. To form into one; make a unit of; reduce to unity or uniformity.

Perception is thus a unifying act. Sir W. Hamilton.

Unless we succeed in finding a rationale of this universal metamorphosis, we obviously fall short of that completely unified knowledge constituting philosophy. H. Spencer, First Principles, p. 397.

II. intrans. To produce unity or uniformity.

These Homeridae were not the only authors of epic poems, but they had the great advantage over other epic bards that they were a gens, and that they worked continuously from generation to generation on the same poems, adding and unifying, and so they produced the epics which have outlived all others. Classical Rev., II. 256.

unigenital (ū-ni-jen'i-tal), a. [< L. unigenitus, only-begotten, < L. unus, one, + genitus, begotten: see genital.] Only-begotten.

unigeniture (ū-ni-jen'i-tūr), n. [< L. unigenitus, only-begotten (see unigenital), + -ure.] The state of being the only-begotten. Ep. Pearson.
Unigenitus (ū-ni-jen'i-tus), n. [NL., so called from the first word ("Unigenitus Dei Filius," etc.): see unigenital.] A bull promulgated by Pope Clement XI. in 1713, and directed against Jansenism. It commenced with the words "Unigenitus Dei Filius," and condemned 101 propositions taken from Quesnel's "Réflexions Morales sur le Nouveau Testament."

unigenous (ū-nij'e-nus), a. [< L. unigena, only-begotten, born of one parent or of one family or kind, < unus, one, + gignere, beget. (cf. unigenital.)] Of one and the same kind; homogeneous.

uniglobular (ū-ni-glob'ū-lār), a. Having or consisting of a single globular part or formation. Geol. Jour., XLVII. 6.

unijugate (ū-ni-jō'gāt), a. [< L. unijugus, having one yoke (< unus, one, + jugum, yoke), + -ate.] In bot., having but a single pair of leaflets: said of a pinnate leaf.

unijugous (ū-ni-jō'gus), a. In bot., same as unijugate.

In the temper of Bacon . . . there was a singular union of andacity and sobriety. Muculady, Lord Bacon.

2. In zool., anat., and bot.: (a) The state of close and immediate connection of parts, organs, or tissues, especially of like parts, or the process of becoming so united; a growing together or its result, as in the different cases of symphysis, synostosis, synchondrosis, ankylosis, confluence, conerescence, coalescence, conjugation, anastomosis, syzygy, zygosus, and the like. See the distinctive words. (b) The connection of two or several individuals in a compound organism, as of several zooids in a zoanthodeme.—3. Matrimony; the matrimonial relation, married state, or conjugal bond.—4. Concord; agreement and conjunction of mind, will, affections, or interest; harmony.

Lay a foundation for a blessed Union among our selves, which would frustrate the great design of our enemies upon us. Stillingsfleet, Sermons, II. vi.

Now, when a mutual Flame you have reveal'd,

And the dear Union of our Souls is seal'd.
Congress, To Cynthia.

Self-love and social at her birth began;
Union the bond of all things, and of man.

Pope, Essay on Man, iii. 149.

5. That which is united or made into one; something formed by a combination of various parts or individual things or persons; an aggregate of united parts; a coalition; a combination; a confederation; a league.

An amalgamation of the Christian religious unions was effected with the sacrificial societies of the pagans.

English Glubs (E. E. T. S.), p. lxxiii.

(a) A confederacy of two or more nations, or of the various states of a nation; in this sense the United States of America is sometimes called by way of preeminence "The Union." (b) In England and Ireland, two or more parishes consolidated into one for the better administration of the poor-laws. It is in the discretion of the Local Government Board to consolidate any two or more parishes into one union under a single board of guardians elected by the owners and ratepayers of the component parishes. Each union has a common workhouse, and all the cost of the relief of the poor is charged upon the common fund. (c) Two or more parishes or contiguous benefices consolidated into one for ecclesiastical purposes. (d) An association of independent churches, generally either Congregational or Baptist, for the purpose of promoting mutual fellowship and cooperation in Christian work. It differs from most ecclesiastical bodies in possessing no authority over the churches which unite in it. (e) A permanent combination among workmen engaged in the same occupation or trade. See trade-union.

[In old days] if here and there a clergyman, a professional man, a politician, or a writer, ventured to raise a voice on behalf of the Unions, he was assailed with a storm of ridicule and abuse.

Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 722.

6. A union workhouse; a workhouse erected and maintained at the joint expense of parishes which have been formed into a union; in Scotland called a combination poor-house.

The poor old people that they brick up in the Unions.

Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, II. 264.

7. That part of a flag which occupies the upper corner next the staff when it is distinguished from the rest in color or pattern, as in the flag of the United States, where it is blue with white stars, or in the flag of Great Britain; the jack. When the flag is hoisted on the staff with the union below, it is considered a signal of distress. See union down, below.

8. A flag showing the union only. See union flag and union jack, below.—9. A joint, screw, or other connection uniting parts of machinery, or the like; a kind of coupling for connecting tubes together.—10. A textile fabric of several materials, or of different kinds of thread.

Then we had an Irish linen, an imitation, you know, a kind of Union, which we call double twist. It is made, I believe, in Manchester, and is a mixture of linen and cotton. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 420.

11. A shallow vat or tray in which partly fermented beer is kept to complete its fermentation or to cleanse itself.—12. A large fine pearl.

In the cup an union shall he throw,
Richer than that which four successive kings
In Denmark's crown have worn.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 283.

Sigheims bishop of Schirburne . . . traiailed thorough India, and returning home brought with him many strange and precious unions and costly speyes.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 5.

Pliny says that the name unio was an invention of the fine gentlemen of Rome, to denote only such pearls as could not be matched.

Nares.

Act of Union, the name by which several statutes organizing the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland are known. (a) A statute of 1535-6, enacting the political union of Wales to England. (b) A statute of 1706, uniting the kingdoms of England and Scotland on and after May 1st, 1707. (c) A statute of 1800, which united the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland on and after January 1st, 1801.—Apperceptive union. See apperceptive.—Bony union, in surg., the knitting of a fracture by callus; opposed to ligamentous union.—Customs union. See customs-union and Zollverein.—Evangelical, hypostatic, Latin, liberal union. See the adjectives.—Liberties' Union Act. See liberty.—Union Assessment Acts. See assessment.—Union by first intention, in surg., the healing of a wound without suppuration. —Union by second intention, in surg., the healing of a wound by granulation after suppuration.—Union churches, a body of Protestant evangelical Christians organized in its present form about 1863. It recognizes no creed except allegiance to the Bible, no test of membership except character, and no ecclesiastical authority superior to that of membership in the local church. Its membership is mainly confined to the Western States in the United States.—Union down, said of a flag displaying the union at the bottom instead of in its normal position at the top. A flag hoisted in this position forms a signal of distress.—Union flag, the union jack, or national flag of the United Kingdom. The national flag of England was the banner of St. George (heraldically described as argent, a cross gules), and soon after the union of the crowns this was united with the Scottish national flag, or banner of St. Andrew (in the language of heraldry, azure, a saltier argent), thus forming the first union flag. On the legislative union with Scotland in 1707 a new design for the national or union flag was adopted, described in heraldic terms as azure, a saltier argent surmounted by a cross gules fluribated or edged of the second. On the union with Ireland the red cross or saltier of St. Patrick was introduced, and as thus modified the flag now exists.—Union jack, the national ensign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, formed by the union of the cross of St. George (red on a white ground), the diagonal cross or saltier of St. Andrew (white on a blue ground), and the diagonal cross or saltier of St. Patrick (red on a white ground).—Universal Postal Union. See postal.—Syn. 1-3. Union, Unity, Junction, Connection. Union is the act of bringing two or more together so as to make but one; as, the union of the Mississippi and the Missouri; union in marriage; or it is the state resulting, or the product of the act; as, the American Union. Unity is only the state of oneness, whether there has or has not been previous distinctness; as, the unity of God, the unity of faith, unity of feeling, interest, labor. Junction expresses not simply collocation, but a real and physical bringing into one. Union and junction differ from connection in that the last does not necessarily imply contact; there may be connection between houses by a portico or walk. It is literal to speak of the connection, and figurative to speak of the union, of England and America by a telegraphic cable.

II. a. Of or pertaining to a union or to the Union (see I., 5 (a)); in favor of the Union: as, the Union party; Union principles; Union sympathies.—Union Labor party, in U. S. politics, a political party formed in 1887, which drew support from the Greenbackers, farmers' organizations, Knights of Labor, etc. It nominated a candidate for President of the United States in 1888.—Union man. (a) In the United States, in the period of the civil war, an opponent of secession and upholder of the federal cause. (b) A member of a trade-union.—Union party, a party which favors the formation or preservation of a union; specifically, the Constitutional Union party. See constitutional.

Unionacea (ū'ni-ō-nā'sē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Unio(u-) + -acea.] A superfamily of integripalliate isomyarian bivalve mollusks, represented by the family Unionidae.
unionacean (ū'ni-ō-nā'sē-an), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Unionacea.
II. n. A member of the Unionacea.
union-bow (ū'nyon-bō), n. A bow made of two or three pieces glued together, as distinguished from the single-piece bow or self-bow. Also called back-bow.
union-cord (ū'nyon-kōrd), n. A round white cord made of linen and cotton combined, used for stay-laces, etc. Dict. of Needlework.—Union-cord braid, a braid composed of two or more cords, usually a worsted or mohair braid like that called Russia braid.
unioned (ū'nyond), a. [< union + -ed.] Exhibiting symbols and proofs of union. [Rare.]
Great Washington arose in view,
And unioned flags his stately steps pursue;
Eldest Gallia's bands and young Columbia's pride.
Joel Barlow, Visions of Columbus.

union-grass (ū'nyon-grās), n. A name for grasses of the genus Uniola.
unionid (ū'ni-ō-nid), n. A unio; any member of the Unionidae.
Unionidae (ū-ni-on'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Unio(u-) + -idae.] A family of bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Unio, and variously limited. (a) Formerly applied to all fresh-water bivalves nares in the shell. (b) Restricted to those with two large and persistent adductor muscles, and the shell regular, with thick epidermis, thin nares layer, prominent external chely numerous and diversified in the United States, where they are mostly called fresh-water mus-shells or clams.

unioniform (ū-ni-on'ī-form), a. [< NL. Unio(u-) + L. forma, form.] Like a unio in shape or aspect; resembling or related to the Unionidae. Also unionoid.
Unioninæ (ū-ni-ō-nī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Unio(u-) + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Unionidae, variously limited. (a) Including all those unios whose branchial orifice is confluent with the pedal, and whose anal siphon is little prolonged. (b) Restricted to such as have the foot compressed and secundiform (thus contrasting with Mycetogastrea); same as Unioninæ (c). unionine (ū'ni-ō-nin), a. Of or pertaining to the Unionina; unioniform in a narrow sense.
unionism (ū'nyon-izm), n. [< union + -ism.] 1. The principle of uniting or combining; specifically, trade-unionism.

I apprehend that the notion which lies at the bottom of Unionism is this: that a man is bound to think not only of himself, but of his fellow-workmen.

Jerons, Social Reform, p. 115.

2. Attachment or loyalty to the principle of union, or to some particular union; specifically, attachment or loyalty to the federal union known as the United States of America, and opposition to its rupture, as by the secession of the Southern States in 1861-5.

Mr. Seward had an abiding faith in the Unionism and latent loyalty of Virginia and the border States.

The Century, XXV. 669.

3. In British politics, the principles or sentiments of the Unionists.

unionist (ū'nyon-ist), n. and a. [< union + -ist.] I. n. 1. One who promotes or advocates union.—2. A member of a trade-union; a trade-unionist. Jerons, Social Reform, p. 109.—3. One who during the American civil war took the side of the national government.

At the same station, we met General Shriver of Frederick, a most loyal Unionist.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 25.

4. [cap.] In British politics, one who is opposed to the dissolution or rupture of the legislative union existing between Great Britain and Ireland, and especially to the separatist principles and tendencies of those who desire to establish home rule in Ireland; a name applied to the Conservatives and Liberal Unionists.

II. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a union or to unionism; promoting or advocating union: as, a unionist movement; a unionist party.

Their [the workmen's] low standard of work, determined by the unionist principle that the better workers must not discredit the worse by exceeding them in efficiency.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, p. 211.

2. Specifically, during the civil war in the United States, of or pertaining to the Union party or cause.

unionistic (ū'nyon-nis'tik), a. [< unionist + -ic.] Pertaining to unionism or unionists; relating to or promoting union.

The various phases of a unionistic movement.

P. Schaff, Hist. Christ. Ch., I. § 22.

unionite (ū'ni-ō-nīt), n. [< NL. Unionites, < Unio(u-), q. v.] A fossil unio, or some similar shell.

union-joint (ū'nyon-joint), n. A pipe-coupling; a union. E. H. Knight.

unionoid (ū'ni-ō-noid), a. and n. [< Unio(u-) + -oid.] I. a. Same as unioniform.
II. n. Same as unionid.

union-pump (ū'nyon-pūmp), n. A pump combined in the same frame with an engine. E. H. Knight.

union-room (ū'nyon-rōm), n. The room in a brewery in which the unions for partly fermented beer stand together, and from which the beer is racked off.

The union-room [Allsop's] contains 1,424 unions, which can cleanse 230,000 gallons at one time.

Bickerdyke.

uniovulate (ū-ni-ō-vū-lāt), a. [< L. unius, one, + NL. ovulum, ovule; see ovule.] Having but one ovule.

unipara (ū-nip'ā-rā), n. A woman who has borne one child.

uniparous (ū-nip'a-rus), a. [< L. unus, one, + parire, bring forth, bear, + -ous.] 1. Producing one at a birth: as, uniparous animals. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.—2. In bot., having but one axis or branch: as, a uniparous cyme.

unipartite (ū-ni-pār'tit), a. [< L. unus, one, + partitus, parted; see partite.] Not separated into parts.

In the theory of the single system the conceptions and symbolisms are to a large extent arithmetical, and are based upon the properties of single integral numbers and their partitions into single integral parts. In this sense the former theory may be regarded as being unipartite.

B, River mussel (Unio littoralis), left valve.

ligament, and variable hinge (thus including the Mutula and Mycetogastrea). (c) Further restricted to the Unionina (b). In the narrowest sense the Unionidae are nearly one thousand species, of most parts of the world, but espe-

Unipartite curve, a curve whose real part forms one continuous whole (it being understood that a passage through infinity does not constitute a severing of the curve).

uniped (ū-ni-ped), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + pes (ped-), foot.] 1. a. Having only one foot.

II. n. One who or that which is one-footed. Compare unimopede. [Rare.]

One of the best gymnasts in Chicago is a person with a wooden leg, which he takes on at the beginning of operations, thus economizing weight and stowage, and performing feats impossible except to unipeds.

W. Matthews, Getting on in the World, p. 194.

Unipeltata (ū-ni-pel-tā-tā), n. pl. [NL. (Latreille), neut. pl. of unipeltatus; see unipeltate.] In Crustacea, a division of stomatopods, containing adult forms of mantis-shrimps; distinguished from Bipeltata. See Squilla.

unipeltate (ū-ni-pel'tāt), a. and n. [< L. unus, one, + pelta, a light shield; see peltate.] 1. a. Having a carapace of one piece, as a crustacean; not bipeltate, like a glass-crab; stomatopodous, as a mantis-shrimp.

II. n. A member of the Unipeltata. See Squilla.

unipersonal (ū-ni-pēr'son-al), a. [< L. unus, one, + persona, person; see personal.] 1. Having but one person; existing in one person: said of the Deity.—2. In gram., used only in one person: chiefly noting verbs used only in the third person singular; impersonal.

unipersonalist (ū-ni-pēr'son-al-ist), n. [< unipersonal + -ist.] One who believes there is but one person in the Deity.

unipersonality (ū-ni-pēr'son-al-i-ti), n. [< unipersonal + -ity.] Existence in one person only.

unipetalous (ū-ni-pet'a-lus), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. petalum, petal; see petal.] Having but one petal.

Such a corolla [consisting of one petal on account of abortion of the others] is unipetalous, a term quite distinct from monopetalous. Encyc. Brit., IV, 132.

uniphonous (ū-ni-fō-nus), a. [< L. unus, one, + Gr. phonē, a sound.] Having or giving out only one sound; monophonic. [Rare.]

That uniphonous instrument the drum. Westminster Rev., Nov., 1832. (Encyc. Diet.)

uniplanar (ū-ni-plā'nār), a. [< L. unus, one, + planum, plane.] Lying in one plane.

The first three chapters of the work deal with the usual problems of hydrodynamics, being occupied principally with those in which the motion is uniplanar or can be expressed by two coordinates.

The Academy, April 11, 1891, p. 349.

Uniplanar dyadic. See dyadic.—Uniplanar node, a degenerate form of a node or conical point on a surface, where the cone degenerates into two coincident planes; same as unode.

uniplicate (ū-nip'li-kāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + plicatus, pp. of plicare, fold; see plicate.] Once folded; having or forming a single fold. Compare duplicate, triplicate, quadruplicate.

unipolar (ū-ni-pō'lār), a. [< L. unus, one, + polus, pole; see polar.] 1. Exhibiting one kind of polarity.

The so-called "unipolar" induction supposed to be due to the rotation of the earth, which it believes like a gigantic magnet. F. G. Taft, Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 339.

2. In biol., having a single pole, as a nerve-cell or a rete: correlated with bipolar, multipolar.

If the rete remains broken up, then it is known as a diffuse, unipolar, or monocentric rete mirabile.

Gelehrte, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 597.

Unipolar conduction. Same as irreversible conduction (which see, under irreversible).—Unipolar dynamo, a dynamo in which an electromotive force is induced in a conductor by causing it to revolve round one pole of a magnet.

unipolarity (ū-ni-pō-lār-i-ti), a. [< unipolar + -ity.] The character of being unipolar.

We do not believe that Ohm ever observed the phenomenon of unipolarity in strong sulphuric acid with electrodes of platinum or gold due to a transition resistance. Philos. Mag., XXVI, 129.

uniporous (ū-nip'ō-rus), a. [< L. unus, one, + porus, pore.] Having one pore.

Wood-cells elsewhere called disjunctive tissue, and to which I applied the terms uniporous and multiporous. Darwin, Geol. Hist. of Plants, p. 169.

unique (ū-nēk'), a. and n. [< F. unique = Sp. P. g. H. unico, < L. unus, one, only, single, < unus, one.] 1. a. Only; single.

Do I mention these scolding inconsistencies to smile at or upbraid my unique cousin? Lamb, My Relations.

2. Having no like or equal; unmatched; sole; unequalled; single in its kind or excellence; often used relatively, and then signifying rare, unusual.

That which gives to the Jews their unique position among the nations is what we are accustomed to regard as their Sacred History. Spectator, No. 3065, p. 1159.

II. n. A unique thing; a thing unparalleled or sole of its kind.

Sir Charles Mordant's gold medal, mean as it is in workman-ship, is extremely curious, and may be termed an unique, being the only one of the kind that has come to our knowledge. Archæologia (1774), III, 374.

Where is the master who could have instructed Franklin, or Washington, or Bacon, or Newton? Every great man is a unique. Emerson, Self-reliance.

uniquely (ū-nēk'li), adv. In a unique manner; so as to be unique.

uniqueness (ū-nēk'nes), n. The state or character of being unique.

uniquity (ū-nēk'wi-ti), n. [Irreg. < unique + -ity.] Uniqueness. [Rare.]

Uniquity will make them valued more.

H. W. pole, Letters, iv, 477 (1789). (Darwin.)

uniradiate (ū-ni-rā-di-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + radius, ray; see radiate.] Having only one ray, arm, or process; monactinal.

uniradiated (ū-ni-rā-di-āt-ed), a. Same as uniradiate.

uniramose (ū-ni-rā-mōs), a. Same as uniramous. Micros. Sci., XXX, 109.

uniramous (ū-ni-rā-mus), a. [< L. unus, one, + ramus, branch; see ramus.] Having but one ramus or branch. See biramous. Encyc. Brit., VI, 652.

unisepalous (ū-ni-sep'a-lus), a. [< L. unus, one, + NL. sepalum, sepal; see sepal.] Having but one sepal.

uniseptate (ū-ni-sep'tāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + septum, partition; see septe.] In zool., and bot., having only one septum or partition.

uniserial (ū-ni-sē-ri-al), a. [< L. unus, one, + series, series; see serial.] 1. Set in one row or series; one-ranked; unifarious. Encyc. Brit., XXII, 190.—2. Beset with one rank, row, or series of things.

uniseriably (ū-ni-sē-ri-al-i), adv. So as to be uniserial; in one series.

uniseriate (ū-ni-sē-ri-āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + series, series; see seriate.] Same as uniseri- al.

uniseriately (ū-ni-sē-ri-āt-li), adv. Same as uniseriably.

uniseriate (ū-ni-ser'āt), a. [< L. unus, one, + serra, saw; see serrate.] Having one row of teeth or serrations; uniseriately serrate.

uniseriate (ū-ni-ser'ō-lāt), a. [< L. unus, one, + serrula, dim. of serra, saw; see serrula.] Having one row of small serrations; uniseriately serrulate.

unisexal (ū-ni-sek'sh-al), a. [< L. unus, one, + sexus, sex; see sexual.] 1. Of one sex—that is, having the two sexes developed in different individuals. [Rare].—2. For or consisting of a single sex. [Rare.]

One final provincialism of the mind there is, which a unisexal college certainly never would have any power to eradicate. . . . It is the provincialism of the exclusively sex point of view itself. The Century, XXXII, 326.

3. Specifically, in entom., having only female individuals: noting the agamic broods of Aphididae and some other insects which, during certain parts of the year, continue to propagate the species without any males. See parthenogenesis.—4. In bot., said of a flower containing the organs of but one sex, stamens or pistil, but not both; dichlinous; opposed to bisexual or hermaphrodite; monocious or diceous. It is also applicable to an inflorescence or a plant with such flowers only.

unisexuality (ū-ni-sek'sh-al-i-ti), n. [< unisexal + -ity.] The state or character of being unisexal, or of having but one sex, as a male or female individual; the opposite of hermaphroditism.

There is some reason to suspect that hermaphroditism was the primitive condition of the sexual apparatus, and that unisexuality is the result of the abortion of the organs of the other sex in males and females respectively. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 67.

unisexually (ū-ni-sek'sh-al-i), adv. So as to be of either sex, but not of both sexes, in one individual: as, animals unisexually developed.

unisilicate (ū-ni-sil'i-kāt), n. [< L. unus, one, + E. silicate.] A salt of orthosilicic acid (H₂SiO₃); so called because the ratio of oxygen atoms combined with the base to those combined with the silicon is 1:1. This is illustrated by zinc unisilicate, willemite, which has the formula Zn₂SiO₄ or 2ZnO.SiO₂.

unisolated (un-is'ō-lā-ted), a. Not isolated or separated; indistinguishable or undistinguishable.

The unisolated hinds of the frog.

Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI, 47.

unison (ū-ni-sōn or -zōn), a. and n. [I. a. Also unisonous, q. v.; = Sp. unisono = Pg. unisono, < ML. unisonus, having one sound, < L. unus, one, + sonus, sound; see sound.] II. n. Early mod. E. unisonne, < F. unisson = Sp. unison = It. unisono, unison, concord of sounds: from the adj.]

1. a. 1. Sounding alone; unisonous.

All sounds on fret by string or golden wire, Temper'd soft tunings, intermix'd with voice, Choral or unison. Milton, P. L., vii, 599.

2. In music, sounded simultaneously; specifically, noting two or more voice-parts that are coincident in pitch, or a passage or effect thus produced.—Unison string, in musical instruments with strings, a string tuned in unison with another string, and intended to be sounded with it. In the pianoforte most of the tones are produced from pairs or triplets of strings thus tuned. Such strings are commonly called unisons.

II. n. 1. In music: (a) The interval, melodic or harmonic, between any tone and a tone of exactly the same pitch; a perfect prime, acoustically represented by the ratio 1:1. The term is also used as a synonym of prime (as, an augmented unison), though this is objectionable. (b) The interval of the octave, especially when occurring between male and female voices, or between higher and lower instruments of the same class.—2. The state of sounding at the same pitch—that is, of being at the interval of a unison.

"But he wants a shoe, poor creature!" said Obadiah. "Poor creature!" said my uncle Toby, vibrating the note back again, like a string in unison.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, V, ii.

3. A single unvaried tone; a monotone. Pope.—4. Same as unison string.—5. Accordance; agreement; harmony; concord.

He chants his prophetic song in exact unison with their designs. Burke, Rev. in France, xvi.

I had the good fortune to act in perfect unison with my colleague. D. Webster, Speech, Boston, June 5, 1828.

unisonal (ū-ni-sō-nal), a. [< unison + -al.] Being in unison; unisonant.

We missed . . . the magnificent body of tone in the broad unisonal passages in the finale.

Athenæum, No. 3082, p. 678.

unisonally (ū-ni-sō-nal-i), adv. In a unisonal manner; in unison.

Tenors and basses burst in unisonally. Church Times, March 4, 1887. (Encyc. Diet.) unisonance (ū-ni-sō-nans), n. [= Sp. Pg. unisonancia; as unisonant (t) + -ce.] Accordance of sounds; unison.

unisonant (ū-ni-sō-nant), a. [= OF. unisonnant; < L. unus, one, + sonant (t)-s, ppr. of sonare, sound; cf. unison.] Being in unison; having the same degree of gravity or acuteness.

Whether the order of those sounds was ascending, descending, or unisonant.

Lambillon, tr. in N. and Q., 7th ser., VII, 161.

unisonous (ū-ni-sō-nus), a. [< ML. unisonus, having one sound; see unison.] 1. Being in unison: said of two or more sounds having the same pitch; unisonant. Grove, Dict. Music, II, 763.—2. Sounding alone; without harmony.

These apt notes were about forty tunes, of one part only, and in one unisonous key.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III, 171.

unispiral (ū-ni-spī-ral), a. In bot., having a single spiral, as the elaters of certain liverworts.

unisulcate (ū-ni-sul'kāt), a. In bot. and zool., having a single groove or furrow; one-grooved.

unit (ū-nit), n. [Formerly unite, a later form of unity; see unity.] 1. A single thing or person, opposed to a plurality; also, any group regarded as individual in a plurality of similar groups; any one of the individuals or similar groups into which a complex whole may be analyzed.

When first, amid the general discredit of the experiment tried by Lord Cornwallis in Bengal proper, the Indian administrators of fifty or sixty years since began to recognize the village community as the true proprietary unit of the country, they had very soon to face the problem of rent. Maine, Village Communities, p. 182.

The family is the integral and formative unit of the nation. E. Molford, The Nation, xii.

The elementary tissues, particularly tracheary, sieve, fibrous, and parenchymatous tissues, are to be considered as the units, and the term Fibro-vascular Bundle as little more than a convenient expression of the usual condition of aggregation of these units. Bossey, Botany, p. 167.

These columns are not fighting units at all, but supply-units, and may be classed with commissariat trains and services of like nature. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL, 805.

2. Any standard quantity by the repetition and subdivision of which any other quantity of the same kind is measured. The unit of abstract arithmetic, called unity, is represented by the numeral 1. The system of units recommended by a committee of the British Association for scientific calculations, and known as the C. G. S. system (abbreviation of centimeter-gram- second system), adopts the centimeter as the unit of length, the gram as the unit of mass, and the second as the unit of time. In this system the unit of area is the square centimeter, the unit of volume is the cubic centimeter, and the unit of velocity is a velocity of a centimeter per second. The unit of momentum is the momentum of a gram moving with a velocity of a centimeter per second. The unit-force is that force which acting on a gram for one second generates a velocity of a centimeter per second. This force is called a dyne. The unit of work is the work done by the force of a dyne working through a distance of a centimeter. This is called an erg. Sometimes used attributively.

The ordinary smallest measure we have of either [extension or duration] is looked on as an unit in number, when the mind by division would reduce them into less fractions. Locke, Human Understanding, II, xv, 9.

For purposes of accuracy it must always be remembered that the pound, the gramme, &c., are, strictly speaking, units of mass. J. D. Everett, Units and Phys. Const., p. 23.

The unit of magnetic moment is the moment of a magnet of unit length (the strength of whose poles is equal to unity, or generally of any magnet the product of whose strength into its length is equal to unity).

J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I, 154.

Absolute unit, a unit of an absolute system of measurement based entirely on arbitrary units of mass, length, and time; sometimes, but quite incorrectly, used as the synonym of a unit of the C. G. S. system, which is only a special system of absolute units. — Abstract unit, the unit of numeration; the number represented by 1. — Alternate units. Same as Hankel's numbers (which see, under number). — B. A. unit of resistance. See ohm. — Concrete or denominate unit, a unit of some definite kind, as a yard, a second, a dollar, a Fahrenheit degree, etc. — Decimal units, duodecimal units, units in scales of numbers increasing or decreasing by ten or twelve. — Electrical units. See electrostatic. — Electromagnetic units. See electromagnetic. — Electrostatic units of electricity. See electrostatic. — Fundamental units. See fundamental. — Magnetic unit, a unit of electrical or magnetic quantity, founded on the forces which act on conductors conveying currents, or on magnets, in a magnetic field. See electromagnetic units, under electromagnetic. — Mouetary unit. See monetary. — Neural units. See neural. — Siemens's unit (named after the electrician Siemens), a unit formerly employed in measuring the electric resistance of a conductor; it is the resistance of a column of pure mercury 1 square millimeter in section and 1 meter long; it is a little less than an ohm. — Thermal unit, a unit adopted for measuring and comparing quantities of heat. In the English system of measures the generally accepted thermal unit is the pound-degree, or the amount of heat required to raise a pound of water from the temperature 50° F. to 51° F. (Taft). In the metric system the unit of heat is the calory; that is, the amount necessary to raise a kilogram of water from 0° to 1° centigrade; or the small calory, the heat needed to raise the temperature of a gram of water the same amount. — Unit angle, in circular measure, same as radian. — Unit field. See field. — Unit jar, an instrument of various forms devised for measuring definite quantities of electricity. — Unit magnetic pole, a pole which repels a like pole at a unit distance with unit force — that is, one dyne. — Unit of capacity of a conductor, the farad. — Unit of electrical resistance, the resistance of a conductor through which a current of unit strength is maintained by unit electromotive force. — Unit of electric potential, the difference of potential between the ends of a straight conductor of unit length, when it is moved with unit velocity in a direction at right angles to lines of force and its own length in a magnetic field of unit intensity. — Unit of force, the dyne or the poundal. See def. 2. — Unit of heat. See thermal unit. — Unit of illumination. See candle-power. — Unit of length, a length in multiples of which other lengths are defined. — Unit of measure, a certain conventional dimension or magnitude assumed as a standard by which other dimensions or magnitudes of the same kind are to be measured, as a foot, a gallon, an ounce, a pound, an hour, and the like. See measure, weight. — Unit of measurement, a quantity used as the consequent of a ratio for defining other quantities. — Unit of output, a unit by which the rate of working or the activity in an electric circuit is measured. The British Board of Trade unit of output is 1,000 watts. — Unit of photometry. See photometric standard, under photometry. — Unit of resistance. See resistance, 3, and ohm. — Unit of self-induction, in elect., in any system of units, the same as the unit of length employed in the basis of the system. For the practical unit of induction in the centimeter-gram-second system, an earth quadrant, or a length equal to 10⁹ centimeters, has been proposed. This unit has been called sechm, which has been replaced by henry. — Unit of tale, a number of things, generally of a particular kind, recognized as a unit, as a dozen, a score, a sum of nails, a lac of rupees, etc. — Unit pole. See pole. — Unit prism, in crystal. See prism, 3. — Unit pyramid, in crystal. See pyramid, 3. — Unit rule, in U. S. politics, a rule sometimes adopted providing that in a national nominating convention the votes of the entire delegation from each State shall be cast in a body for the candidate preferred by the majority of the delegation, the wishes of the minority being disregarded.

unitable (ū-ni'tā-bl), a. [< unite + -able] Capable of being united; capable of union by growth or otherwise. Also spelled uniteable.

unital (ū-ni'tāl), a. [< unit + -al] Of or pertaining to a unit; unitary. [Rare.]

In nature there is a great, unital, continuous . . . development. Littell's Living Age, No. 2071, March 1, 1884, p. 513.

unitarian (ū-ni-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [As unitary + -an] I. a. 1. Of or relating to a unit or unity, or to one thing or plan or party; unitary.

It [division of powers] forms the essential distinction between a federal system such as that of Anach or Switzerland, and a unitarian system of government such as that which exists in England or Russia.

A. V. Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 112.

These two theories, the one dualistic, the other unitarian, strangely foreshadow the discoveries of modern dynamics. Encyc. Brit., I, 400.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the Unitarians or their doctrines. — Unitarian Church. See II, 1.

II. n. 1. [cap.] One who maintains the impersonality of the Deity; one who denies the doctrine of the Trinity; specifically, a member of a Christian body founded upon the doctrine of impersonality. The churches of the Unitarian body are congregational in government, and independent of one another. They possess no common symbol of doctrine, and differ widely among themselves. They may be divided into two schools of thought, though there is no sharply defined line between them. The conservative Unitarians hold doctrinal views in many respects resembling those of the orthodox Trinitarians, except in their denial of the trinitarianity of the Deity. They accept Christ as the manifestation of God in a human life, though they do not regard him as equal in character or power with the Father. They believe in the work of the Holy Spirit, though they do not generally regard him as a distinct personality. They believe in the Scriptures as containing a divine revelation, and in the miracles as an attestation of that revelation. They hold a doctrine of inherited depravity, but not in guilt, except as the result of a personal choice; to a doctrine of future retribution, though not generally to its endlessness; to an atonement by Christ for the sins of mankind, but not to the expiatory theory of that atonement (see atonement); and to the necessity of regeneration wrought by the Spirit of God, but only with the cooperation of man; in what is called "irresistible grace" they do not believe. The doctrines of election, reprobation, foreordination, and decrees, as those doctrines are interpreted in the Calvinistic symbols, they repudiate as unscriptural and irrational. The radical school of Unitarians hold views not materially varying from deism. They reverence Christ as a peculiarly holy man, with whom the Spirit of God abode, but in no sense other than that in which he abides with every truly holy man. They respect the Bible as a work of transcendent moral genius, but in no other sense inspired. They do not believe in the miracles, and either explain them as the product of natural causes or regard the accounts of them as mythical and traditional. They do not accept the doctrines of atonement and regeneration, and do not employ the terms; and they both attribute sin to defective education, intellectual and moral, and depend upon a right education to redeem the world from its evils. The Unitarian movement in the United States was developed chiefly in New England about the beginning of the nineteenth century, under the lead of Dr. Channing. Many of the oldest Congregational churches in New England passed under Unitarian control, and the "American Unitarian Association" was formed in 1825. Outside of the denomination proper, Unitarian views are held by the Hicksite Friends, some Universalists, and by individuals in other denominations. See Arian, Socinianism.

2. A monotheist; a believer in one God, as opposed to a polytheist, or a believer in many gods. In this sense it is applicable to all Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans, as well as deists. Fleming. [Rare.]

3. A monist.

The Realists or Substantialists are again divided into Dualists, and into Unitarians or Monists, according as they are or are not contented with the testimony of consciousness to the ultimate duplicity of subject and object in perception. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaphysics, xvi.

4. One who advocates any unitary system; an advocate of unity; in politics, an advocate of centralization.

The old men studied magic in the flowers,
And human fortunes in astronomy,
And an omnipotence in chemistry,
Preferring things to names, for these were men,
We were unitarians of the united world,
And, wheresoever their clear eye beams fell,
They caught the footsteps of the Same.

Emerson, Elight.

Unitarianism (ū-ni-tā'ri-an-izm), n. [< Unitarian + -ism] 1. The affirmation of the impersonality of the Deity; the denial of the doctrine of the Trinity, or (rarely) of polytheism; the doctrines of the Unitarians. — 2. [l. c.] Any unitary system.

The principle, in short, which gives its form to our government is (to use a foreign but convenient expression) unitarianism, or the habitual exercise of supreme legislative authority by one central power.

A. V. Dicey, Law of the Constitution, p. 117.

3. [l. c.] In philos., the doctrine that mind and matter are one, or that there is but one general kind of substance.

Unitarianize (ū-ni-tā'ri-an-iz), v. [< Unitarian + -ize] To cause to conform, or to conform to Unitarianism. Imp. Dict.

unitary (ū-ni-tā'ri), a. [= F. unitaire = Sp. It. unitario, unitarian (chiefly as a noun, a Unitarian); as unit, unit-y, + -ary] 1. Of or relating to a unit; of the nature of a unit; not divided; entire; specifically noting in chemistry that system in which the molecules of all bodies are compared, as to their magnitude, with one molecule—water, for example—and all chemical reactions are as far as possible reduced to one typical form of reaction, namely double decomposition. Watts, Dict. of Chem. — 2. Of or pertaining to, or characterized by, unity or uniformity; also, directed at or striving for unity;

as, a unitary system of thought; in politics, centralized.

Man loves the Universal, the Unchangeable, the Unitary. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 110.

Had any one doubted before that the rights of human nature are unitary, . . . the efforts of the advocates of slavery . . . could not fail to sharpen his eyes.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 173.

We know that the separation and isolation of the different parts of a once unitary community must necessarily bring about a separation of its language into different dialects. W. D. Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., ix.

It of course by no means follows that, because we have become in the fullest organic sense a nation, ours has become a unitary government, its federal features merged in a new national organization. W. Wilson, State, § 881.

3. In bool., monistic, as distinguished from dualistic.

The tendency called unitary or monistic . . . must ultimately prevail throughout philosophy.

Haeckel, Evolution of Man (trans.), I, 17.

4. Pertaining to or of the nature of a unit (of measurement).

A wind pressure of 1.20 pounds for the same unitary distance is allowed for. Sci. Amer., N. S., LX, 304.

5. In math., involving a root to unit power.

Unitas Fratrum (ū-ni'tas frā'trum). [NL., unity of brethren; L. unitas, unity; fratrum, gen. pl. of frater, brother; see brother.] The proper official name of the Moravian Church. See Moravian, n. 2.

unitate (ū-ni-tāt), v. t.: pret. and pp. unitated, ppr. unitating. [A back-formation from unitation.] To perform the operation of unitation upon.

unitate (ū-ni-tāt), v. [As unit + -ate.] The remainder given by a number after division by a digit.

unitation (ū-ni-tā'shon), n. [< unit + -ation.]

1. Expression in terms of units; measurement in accordance with a system of units. — 2. The operation of adding to the units of a number, written in the Arabic notation, (10—N) times the tens (where N is any number less than 10), (10—N)² times the hundreds, etc., and repeating the process until a digit is obtained. This (diminished by any multiple of N which it exceeds) is the remainder after dividing the original number by N.

unite¹ (ū-ni't'), v.: pret. and pp. united, ppr. uniting. [< LL. unites, pp. of unire (> It. unire = Sp. Eg. unir = F. unir), make one or as one, join together. < L. unis, one; see one, a. Cf. one, v., and abunation.] I. trans. 1. To combine or conjoin so as to form one; make to be one and to be no longer separate; incorporate in one: as, to unite two kingdoms or two armies.

Unite

Your troops of horsemen with his hands of foot.

Shak., I Ben. VI, iv, 1, 164.

As thou hast united our nature to thy eternal being, thou mightest also unite my person to thine by the interior adunations of love, and obedience, and conformity.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 37.

2. To connect, conjoin, bring together, or associate by some bond, legal or other; join in interest, affection, fellowship, or the like; ally; link together; associate; conjoin; couple; combine: as, to unite families by marriage; to unite nations by treaty; to unite fresh adherents to a cause.

Hymen did our hands

Unite communal in most sacred bands.

Shak., Hamlet, iii, 2, 170.

3. To make to agree or be uniform; harmonize.

The king proposed nothing more than to unite his kingdom in one form of worship. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

4. To cause to adhere; attach; connect together; as, to unite bricks or stones by means of cement.

The pectonum, which is a dry body, may be united with the muscous flesh. Wiscand, Surgery.

= Syn. 1. To consolidate, amalgamate, blend, merge.

II. intrans. 1. To become one; become combined or incorporated; be consolidated; coalesce; combine; commingle.

Virgin Mother, hail!

High in the love of Heaven; yet from us by bonds
Thou shalt proceed, and from thy womb the Son Of God Most High; so God with man unites.

Milton, P. L., XII, 282.

2. To join in action; concur; act in concert.

If you will now unite in your complaints,
And force them with a constancy, the cardinal Cannot stand under them.

Shak., Hen. VIII, iii, 2, 1.

unite¹ (ū-ni't'), a. [< LL. unites, pp. of unire, unite; see *unite*¹, v.] United; joint. Webster.

unite¹ (ū-ni't'), n. [*< unite*¹, v., with ref. to the union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland alluded to on the coin in the motto "Faciam eos in gentem unam," "I will make them one nation" (Ezek. xxxvii. 22.) An English gold coin issued by James I. and current for 20 shillings; a jacobus. A gold coin of the same name and value was issued under Charles I., when it was also called carolus (which see), and under the Commonwealth and Charles II.

unite², n. An obsolete spelling of unit.

uniteable, a. See unitable. Dr. H. More.

united (ū-nī'ted), p. a. [< unite¹ + -ed²] 1. Joined or combined; made one; made to agree; allied; harmonious: as, a united household.

The united strength of all the gods above
In vain resists the omnipotence of Jove.

Pope, Iliad, l. 734.

[England] found it difficult to maintain a contest against the united navies of France and Spain.

Macaulay, Lord Clive.

2. In Rom. Cath. usage, noting those communities which have separated from Oriental churches and united with the Roman Catholic Church in what it holds to be essential, but preserve an individual and distinctive church organization, acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope, and accepting the doctrinal decisions of the Roman Catholic Church, while retaining to some extent their ancient liturgy, rites, discipline, and usages.—United Armenians. See Armenian Church, under Armenian.—United Brethren. See brother and Moravian.—United Brethren in Christ, a Christian denomination, Unitarian in doctrine, and essentially, although not universally, Methodist in polity. It was founded in Pennsylvania in 1800 by Philip William Otterbein. The government of the church is vested primarily in a general conference. The chief officers of the church are bishops elected every four years, presiding elders, and pastors appointed to their charges according to a system of itinerancy. The denomination makes the mode of baptism and the practice of feet-washing optional with each of its members.—United Colonies of New England. See New England Confederation, under confederation.—United Greeks, the members of those churches which retain, with some important modifications, the Greek liturgy and discipline, and other ancient Greek usages—as marriage of the lower clergy, communion under both kinds, and the use of leavened bread in the communion service—but are in union with the Roman Catholic Church. They are found chiefly in Austria-Hungary, Russia, Italy, and Turkey. See Unit.—United Irishmen, an Irish society formed in 1791 by T. W. Tone, for the purpose of procuring parliamentary reform and the repeal of the penal laws. It afterward became a secret society with revolutionary aims, and was influential in causing the Irish rebellion of 1795.—United Kingdom. See kingdom.—United Original Seceders. See seceder.—United Presbyterian Church. See Presbyterianism.—United Provinces, the seven provinces of the Low Countries, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Gelderland, Groningen, and Overijssel, which in 1579 formed the Union of Utrecht and laid the foundation of the republic of the Netherlands.—United States, used attributively, of or pertaining to the United States of America; American: as, the United States army; the United States navy; the United States statutes; colloquially, the United States language. The adjective United States is used where American may appear less exact.

unitedly (ū-nī'ted-li), adv. In a united manner; with united or joint efforts; jointly; amicably.

unitentacular (ū-nī'ten-tak'ū-lār), a. Having but one tentacle. Amer. Nat., XXIII, 597.

uniter (ū-nī'tēr), n. [< unite¹ + -er¹] One who or that which unites or forms a connection.

The Priest presides over the worship of the people; is the Uniter of them with the Unseen Holy. Carlyle.

uniterable (un-it'ēr-ā-bl), a. That cannot be renewed or repeated.

To play away an uniterable life.

Sir T. Erskine, Christian Morals, iii. § 23.

union (ū-nish'ūn), n. [< ML. unio, un-], a uniting. < LL. unire, unite: see unit¹. The act of uniting, or the state of being united; junction; union. [Rare.]

As long as any different substance keeps off the union, hope not to cure the wound. Wiseman, Surgery, v. 1.

The precise and total meaning of Christianity . . . is that it affirms the perfect union of the Divine and human natures in Christ. H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 242.

unitism (ū-nī-tizm), n. [< unit + -ism.] Same as monism, 1.

unitive (ū-nī-tiv), a. [< unite¹ + -ive.] Having the power of uniting; causing or tending to unite; producing or promoting union; harmonizing.

There is a degree of meditation so exalted that it changes the very name, and is called contemplation; and it is in the unitive way of religion—that is, it consists in unions and adherences to God.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), l. 71.

A unitive power.

J. H. Newman, Development of Christ, Doct., i. 33.

unitively (ū-nī-tiv-li), adv. In a unitive or uniting manner. Cudworth. [Rare.]

unitize (ū-nī-tiz), v. t. pret. and pp. unitized, ppr. unitizing. [< unit + -ize.] To form into or reduce to a unit; make a unit of; cause to be one. Imp. Dict.

unity (ū-nī-ti), n.: pl. unities (-tiz). [Formerly also unité (also reduced unit, unit: see unit); < OF. (and F.) unité = Sp. unidad = Pg. unidade = It. unità, < L. unitus (-t-), oneness, singleness, sameness, uniformity, agreement, < unus, one: see un-.] 1. The state or property of being one; oneness, as opposed to multiplicity; individuality, as opposed to plurality.

Now unity, which is defined, is in its own nature more apt to be understood than multiplicity, which in some measure participates of infinity. Dryden, Life of Plutarch.

It sufficing to the unity of any idea that it be considered as one representation or picture, though made up of ever so many particulars.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiv. 1.

2. Organic totality; that interconnection of parts which constitutes a complex whole; a systematic whole as distinguished from its constituent parts: as, the unity of consciousness; the unity of an artistic creation. See def. 9.

The simplest human consciousness contains more than sensation, it contains a reference of sensation to objects; the simplest human consciousness also contains some conception of the unity of all objects in one world (were it but that it represents them all as existing in one space and one time).

Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 203.

An empirical acquaintance with facts rises to a scientific knowledge of facts, as soon as the mind discovers beneath the multiplicity of single production the unity of an organic system.

Max Muller.

3. Identity; self-sameness; uniformity.

If the unity of the Ego is really illusory, if the permanent identical "I" is not a fact but a fiction, as Hume and his followers maintain, why should one part of the series of feelings into which the Ego is resolved be concerned with another part of the same series, any more than with any other series?

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 389.

We are able to say that the Unity or Continuity of nature is a principle or law of experience.

W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 267.

4. The state of being united or combined in one; especially, union as connected parts of a complex whole: as, the national unity of the separate states.

England had hardly as yet [829] realized the need of national unity, and outside the king's council chamber there can have been few who understood the need of union between the nations of Christendom.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., ii.

5. Harmony or accord in sentiments, affection, action, etc.; concord.

How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!

Ps. cxxxiii. 1.

Unity, secrecy, decision, are the qualities which military arrangements require.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

6. Sameness of character or effect; agreement; coincidence.

There is such unity in the proofs. Shak., W. T., v. 2. 35.

7. In math., a quantity which, multiplied by any quantity of the system considered, gives that same quantity as the product. Thus, in the theory of matrices, the matrix of any order having all the constituents zero except those of the principal diagonal, which are all ones, is the unity of that order. In ordinary algebra one, or the unit of abstract number, is the only unity. Unit and unity are words frequently confused; but with accurate writers unit is the standard of measurement, that which is counted, and has no reference to multiplication; while unity has reference to multiplication alone. In a multiple associative algebra there are as many units as the ordinal number of the algebra, but there can be but one unity, and there need not be any at all.

8. The principle by which a uniform tenor of story and propriety of representation is preserved in literary compositions; conformity in a composition to this principle; a reference to some one purpose or leading idea, or to the main proposition, in all the parts of a discourse or composition. The so-called Aristotelian law of unity of time, of place, and of action (called 'the unities') in a drama was the fundamental rule or general idea from which the French classical dramatic writers and critics derived, or to which they referred, all their practical rules for the construction of a drama. This law demanded that there should be no shifting of the scene from place to place, that the whole series of events should be such as might occur within the space of a single day, and that nothing should be admitted irrelevant to the development of the single plot.

The author has not observed a single unity in his whole play.

Adison, Sir Timothy Tittle.

The writers of plays have what they call unity of time and place, to give a justness to their representation.

Steele, Spectator, No. 358.

The so-called unities of time and place are purely fictitious principles, to either of which it may be convenient to adhere in order to make the unity of an action more distinctly perceptible, and either of which may with equal propriety be disregarded in order to give the action probability.

A. W. Ward, Introd. to Eng. Dram. Lit., p. xi.

9. In artistic creations, a combination of parts such as to constitute a whole or to exhibit a form of symmetry in style and character; the quality of any work by which all the parts are subordinate to or promotive of one general design or effect.

Among the susceptibilities touched by artistic arrangements may be noticed the sense of Unity in multitude, arising when a great number of things are brought under a comprehensive design, as when a row of pillars is crowned by a pediment.

A. Bath, Emotions and Will, p. 235, note.

10. In law: (a) The holding of the same estate in undivided shares by two or more; joint tenancy. (b) The joint possession by one person of two rights by several titles.—11. A gold coin of the reign of James I. See unit¹.—Architectonic unity. See architectonic.—At unity, at one; in accord or harmony.

A character at unity with itself . . . is strong by its very negations.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, v. 2.

Formal unity. See formal.—Manchester Unity. See Odd-Fellow.—Material, mathematical, numerical unity. See the adjectives.—Primitive 11th root of unity. See primitive.—Unity of apperception. See apperception.—Unity of estate, of possession, of time, of title. See estate in joint tenancy, under estate.—Unity of type, in bibl. See type.—Syn. 1-4. Junction, Connection, etc. See union.

univalence (ū-niv'a-lens), n. [< univalen(t) + -cc.] In chem., the property of being univalent.

univalency (ū-niv'a-lən-si), n. [As univalence (see -cy).] Same as univalence. Also called monovalency.

univalent (ū-niv'a-lent), a. [< L. unus, one, + valen(-t-), ppr. of valere, be strong, have power: see valid.] Having a valence of one; capable of replacing a single hydrogen atom in combination.

univald (ū-niv'a-lid), a. Same as univalent.

univalvate (ū-nī-val'vāt), a. [As univalve + -ate¹.] Same as univalve.

univalve (ū-nī-valv), n. and a. [< L. unus, one, + valva, valve: see valve.] I. a. 1. Having one valve only, as a mollusk; not bivalve or multivalve; univalved or univalvular. See II.—2. Having the earapace single, or not hinged in the middle line: specifying the cladoceros or daphniaeous crustaceans. [Now rare.]—3. In bot., consisting of one valve or piece.

II. n. In conch., a univalve mollusk or its shell; a shell consisting of a single piece; formerly, a member of one of three Linnean divisions of Testacea, as distinguished from bivalves and multivalves. The great group of gastropods are univalves. The single valve is sometimes very small, slight, rudimentary, or hidden beneath the mantle; but in most cases it is large and stout, nearly or completely enclosing the soft parts; and in such cases it usually acquires a twist or spiral coil, either in one plane, or, oftener, rising in a conical spire endlessly varied in details of size, shape, etc. Such coiled univalve shells are familiar objects, as those of the snail, whelk, periwinkle, etc. Sometimes the coils are quite flat, as in the planorbis; or the spire is so slight, and the first whorl so large, that the resulting figure is ear-like or saucer-shaped, as in the ommer. Some univalves are simple caps or cones, as the limpets. Some are tubular, as the tooth-shells; or tubular and variously contorted, as the worm-shells or vermetids. Some have an egg-shaped or fusiform figure. Many univalves have actually a second shell or valve, the operculum or lid of the aperture; this, however, does not count against their being univalvular. Many forms of ordinary univalves have special names, as helix, conoid, discoïd, ovoid, trachelid, turbinat, turreted. The direction of the coiling, whether right or left, is dextrose or sinistrose; a coiling in the opposite from the usual direction is reversed. The first whorl of a spiral univalve is the body-whorl; its opening is the aperture; the lips of the aperture are the outer or labrum, and the inner or columella, the labium; the lips may be variously produced, winged or alate, canaliculate, etc. (See holostomatous, siphonostomatous.) The central pillar around which the whorls are coiled is the columella; the whorls above the body-whorl or aperture are collectively the spire, ending at the tip, point, or apex. The opposite end of the shell is the base, which often presents a depression, the umbilicus; the circumference, a completely lipped aperture, is the peristome. The spiral line between the successive whorls or volutions is the suture. Words italicized above with various cuts there, or there cited.

A Univalve Shell, in longitudinal, showing spiral whorls and other formations.

univalved (ū-ni-valvd), a. [As univrate + -ed.] Same as univrate.

univalvular (ū-ni-val'vū-lār), a. [As univrate + -ul-ar.] Same as univrate.

universal (ū-ni-vēr'sal), a. and n. [C. F. universus = Sp. Pg. universal = It. universale, < L. universalis, of or belonging to all or to the whole, < universus, all together, whole, entire, collective, general: see universe. Hence colloq. abbr. versal, varsal.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the universe in its entirety, or to the human race collectively.

Sole monarch of the universal earth.

Shak., R. and J., iii. 2. 94.

All partial evil, universal good.

Pope, Essay on Man, i. 292.

2. Pertaining to all things or to all mankind distributively. This is the original and most proper signification.

Those men which have no written law of God to show what is good or evil carry written in their hearts the universal law of mankind, the Law of Reason, whereby they judge, as by a rule which God hath given unto all men for that purpose. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 16.

Nothing can be to us Catholic or universal in Religion but what the Scripture teaches.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, xiii.

Which had the universal sanction of their own and all former ages. Storg, Speech, Salem, Sept. 18, 1828.

3. Belonging to or predicated of all the members of a class considered without exception: as, a universal rule. This meaning arose in logic, where it is called the complex sense of universal, and has been common in Latin since the second century.

Hearing applause and universal shout.

Shak., M. of V., iii. 2. 144.

We say that every argument which tells in favour of the universal suffrage of the males tells equally in favour of female suffrage. Macaulay, West. Rev. Def. of Mill.

4. In logic, capable of being predicated of many individuals or single cases: general. This, called the simple sense of universal, in which the word is precisely equivalent to general, is quite opposed to its etymology, and perpetuates a confusion of thought due to Aristotle, whose καθόλου it translates. (See II. 1 (b).) In Latin it is nearly as old, perhaps older, than def. 3.—Universal agent, in law, an agent with unqualified power to act, in place of his principal, in all things which the latter can delegate, as distinguished from a general agent, who has unrestricted power in respect to a particular kind of business or at a particular place.—Universal arithmetic, algebra.—Universal chuck, a form of chuck having a face-plate with dogs which can move radially and simultaneously, to hold objects of different sizes.—Universal church, in theol., the church of God throughout the world.—Universal cognition. See cognition.—Universal compass, a compass with extension legs adapted for striking circles of either large or small size.—Universal conception, a general concept.—Universal conversion. See conversion, 2.—Universal coupling, a coupling so made that the parts united may meet at various angles, as a gimbal joint.—Universal deluge. See deluge, 1.—Universal dial. See dial.—Universal ferment. See ferment.—Universal Friends, an American sect of the eighteenth century, followers of Jemima Wilkinson, who professed to have prophetic and miraculous powers.—Universal galvanometer, a galvanometer capable of measuring either currents or electromotive forces or resistances. It usually consists of an ordinary galvanometer, which may have any suitable form, combined with a set of resistance-coils and a slide-bridge all mounted on one base.—Universal gravitation. See gravitation.—Universal instrument, in astron., a species of altitude and azimuth instrument constructed so as to combine portability with great power. The telescope of the instrument, instead of being a straight tube, is usually broken into two arms at right angles to each other in the middle of its length, and at the break a totally reflecting prism turns the rays entering the object-glass along the eye-end of the telescope which forms part of the horizontal axis of the circle, so that the telescope becomes free to move through all altitudes.—Universal joint. See joint.—Universal legatee, in Scots law, a legatee to whom a testator gives his whole estate, subject only to the burden of other legacies and debts.—Universal lever, logic, method, partnership. See the nouns.—Universal mood, a mood of syllogism concluding a universal proposition.—Universal part, a part of a universal whole. Sir W. Hamilton.—Universal Postal Union. See postal.—Universal proposition. See proposition.—Universal successor, in Scots law, an heir who succeeds to the whole of the heritage of a person who dies intestate.—Universal suffrage. See suffrage.—Universal switch, an apparatus used in telegraph- and telephone-offices for facilitating the connecting of one line to another. It usually consists of a large board or slab of insulating material, on the face of which are mounted two sets of parallel conducting-rods placed across one another. Each rod forms the terminal of one line, and hence any two lines can be connected together by a plug where their terminal rods cross each other.—Universal syllogism, theorem, time, etc. See the nouns.—Universal umbel. See umbel.—Universal unity, the capability of existing in many subjects while retaining its identity. This is the unity of a general character belonging to many objects.—Universal validity, cogency for all men. This is a phrase used by certain writers who misapprehend the doctrine of Kant.—Universal whole, a class with respect to the subjects included under it. = Syn. 3. General, etc. See common.

II. n. 1. In logic: (a) One of the five predicables of the Aristotelians, or logical varieties of predicates, which are said to be genus, species, difference, property, and accident. (b) A general term or predicate, or the general nature which such a term signifies. In order to understand the great dispute concerning universals it is necessary to remark that the word in this sense entirely departs from its etymology. The universe is incapable of general description, and consists of objects connected by dynamical relations and recognized by associations of contiguity; while a universal is an idea connected with experience by associations of resemblance merely. But though a universal is, in its universality, thus not contracted to actual existence, it does not necessarily follow that things real have in their real existence no universal predicates. The common belief is that the mutual actions of things are subjected to laws that are really general—that the laws of mechanics, for instance, are not mere accidental uniformities, but have a real virtue. These laws may be subject to exceptions and interference; such has always been the vulgar belief, and in most ages that of philosophers; it may be they are never precisely followed. But any tendency in the things themselves toward generalizations of their characters constitutes what is termed a universal in re. Before the laws of physics were established it was particularly the uniformities of heredity, and consequent commonness of organic forms, which specially attracted attention; so that man and horse are the traditional examples of universals in re. The dispute concerning universals chiefly concerns the universals in re, and arises from the different degrees of importance attributed by different minds to the dynamical and to the intelligible relations of things. Those who follow the common opinion are called realists. The other party, looking at the blind dynamical character of the connections of things, denies that there is any real operation of law or intelligible guidance. These are the nominalists, who may take one of three main positions. First, there are those who hold that the uniformities of nature are due to the interference on every single occasion of general creative ideas, called universals ante rem. Second, there are those who, admitting that intelligible relations do govern one great department of creation—namely, the world of thought, so that there are general conceptions, called universals post rem—insist that the notion of a law of nature, properly speaking, is purely illusory. Things as they are are therefore entirely incomprehensible, and all that is intelligible is mere seeming. Yet this seeming has so consistent a character that it is for all intents and purposes the real world; and this seemingly real world is seemingly governed by law, which, indeed, is the only feature in it which makes it seem like real. This is substantially Kantianism. Third, there are those who deny universals in re, ante rem, and post rem, holding that association by resemblance is reducible to association by contiguity, that generalization takes place only upon paper or in talk, and that every fact is at bottom unintelligible. In the middle ages, if not at all times, the realistic opinion has often been carried too far, the mere resemblances of things, which are nothing but the native tendency of the mind to associate them, being supposed to indicate more intimate dynamical relations than can justly be inferred on such a ground alone.

2t. The whole; the system of the universe.

To what end had the angel been set to keep the entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion if the universal had been paradise? Raleigh, Hist. World.

Posterioristic and prioristic universals. See posterioristic.

Universalian (ū-ni-vēr-sā'li-an), a. [C. universal + -ian.] Same as Universalist. [Rare.] universalisation, universalise, etc. See universalization, etc.

Universalism (ū-ni-vēr'sal-izm), n. [C. universal + -ism.] The doctrine or belief of Universalists.

Universalist (ū-ni-vēr'sal-ist), a. and n. [C. universal + -ist.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Universalism: as, Universalist views.

II. n. 1. One who, professing the Christian faith, believes that all mankind will eventually be redeemed from sin and suffering, and brought back to holiness and God. The name is properly applicable to all those who hold to the final salvation of all men; but it is specifically applied to a body of Christians with a distinct church organization, who, like the Unitarians, have no authoritative symbol of doctrine, and on other points than the salvation of the race differ among themselves.

2. [i. e.] One who affects to understand everything. [Rare.]

A modern freethinker is a universalist in speculation; any proposition whatsoever he is ready to decide; self-assurance supplies all want of abilities. Bentley, Philoethensia Lipsiensis, § 3.

universalistic (ū-ni-vēr-sal-ist'ik), a. [C. universalist + -ic.] 1. Of, relating to, or affecting the whole; universal.

Distinguishing hedonism into the two kinds, egoistic and universalistic, according as the happiness sought is that of the actor himself or is that of all.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, p. 151.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to Universalism; Universalist.

universality (ū-ni-vēr'sal'i-ti), n. [C. F. universalitas = Sp. universalidad = Pg. universalidade = It. universalità, < ML. universalitas (t-s), < L.

universalis, universal: see universal.] 1. The state or character of being universal; unlimited application or extent.

Set before your faith the freeness and the universality of the promise. Consider of God's offer, and urging it upon all; and that he hath excepted from the conditional covenant no man in the world. Baxter, Saints' Rest, iv. 1.

Another objection to all this remedy is, its want of universality. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 14.

2. Unlimited adaptability; boundless versatility.

It was soon manifested that Garrick's universality, by reason of his natural endowments and acquired accomplishments, would no longer admit of any competitor for theatrical fame. Life of Quin (reprint 1857), p. 37.

3t. The universe. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

universalization (ū-ni-vēr'sal-i-zā'shōn), n. [C. universalize + -ation.] The act or process of making universal or general; generalization. Also spelled universalisation.

Reflexion, by separating the essence or species from the subsistence, obtains the full specific idea (universalization). Encyc. Brit., XX. 853.

universalize (ū-ni-vēr'sal-iz), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. universalized, ppr. universalizing. [= F. universaliser; as universal + -ize.] To make universal; generalize. Berkeley. Also spelled universalise.

To find out what is morally right, we have only to ask what actions may be universalized. Caird, Hegel, p. 121.

The former Realism and Nominalism were lifted into a higher phase by the principle of the universalizing action of intellect. Encyc. Brit., II. 292.

universally (ū-ni-vēr'sal-i), adv. In a universal manner; as a universal; with extension to the whole; in a manner to comprehend all; without exception.

universalsness (ū-ni-vēr'sal-nes), n. Universality.

universanimous (ū-ni-vēr-san'i-mus), a. [C. L. universus, general, + animus, mind.] Of one mind or opinion; unanimous. Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., p. 36. [Rare.]

universe (ū-ni-vēr's), n. [C. F. univers = Sp. Pg. It. universo, < L. universum, all things, as a whole, the universe, neut. of universus, O. L. universus, also contr. universus, later universus, all together, whole, entire, collective, general, lit. turned or combined into one, < unus, one, + vertere, pp. versus, turn.] 1. The totality of existing things; all that is in dynamical connection with general experience taken collectively—embracing (a) the Creator and creation; or (b) psychical and material objects, but excluding the Creator; or (c) material objects only.

For nothing in this wide universe I call,
Save thou, my rose; in it thou art my all.

Shak., Sonnets, civ.

For this beauty of the universe is an emblem and revelation of the Divinity. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 13.

2. The whole world; all mankind; all that meets us in experience, in a loose sense.—3. In logic, the collection of all the objects to which any discourse refers: as, the universe of things. The things belonging to a universe cannot be defined or discriminated by any general characters; for every universal proposition excludes some general description of objects from the universe which had been supposed to be found in it. It is only in their dynamical connections that the objects of the universe can be distinguished from all others; and therefore no general term in a proposition can show what universe is meant; but an index is necessary. See index, n. 2.

Everything in the universe (whatever that universe may embrace) is either A or not A.

De Morgan, Formal Logic (1847), ii.

We must be supposed to know the nature and limits of the universe of discourse with which we are concerned, whether we state it or not. If we are talking of ordinary phenomena we must know whether we refer to them without limit of time and space; and if not, within what limits, broadly speaking. If we include the realms of fiction and imagination we must know what boundaries we mean to put upon them. Venn, Symbolic Logic, vi.

Egg of the universe. See egg.—The hub of the universe. See hub.—Tree of the universe. See figural.

Sw. universitet = Russ. universitet, < L. universitas (t-s), the whole, the universe, LL. a society, company, corporation, guild, ML. a university, < universus, all together, whole, entire, collective, general: see universe.] 1t. The whole; the universe.

The eye of intelligence is bevere, for it summiteth the envynonyne of the universe.

Chaucer, Boethius, v. prose 4.

Speaking with respect to the universality of things. Barrow, Sermons, II. 12.

24. A corporation; a guild.

Some of them are worthy to be expelled both thence and out of the university.

Ips. Ridley, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc.), II. 372.

3. An association of men for the purpose of study, which confers degrees which are acknowledged as valid throughout Christendom, is endowed, and is privileged by the state in order that the people may receive intellectual guidance, and that the theoretical problems which present themselves in the development of civilization may be resolved. The earliest university was the medical school of Salerno, which was closed in 1817, after a life of about a thousand years. The two models of all the other old universities were those of Bologna and Paris, the former a law school, the latter making theology its chief concern, both founded in the second half of the twelfth century—an epoch at which the advantages that were to accrue to the world from certain studies were strongly felt. The university of Paris had from the outset four faculties, or branches of study (a word also applied to the associate body of teachers in each branch)—theology, canon law, medicine, and arts. But the study of arts—including logic and rhetoric from the trivium, and the quadrivium (arithmetic, geometry, music, and astronomy)—was regarded as merely preliminary to the others, which alone, as attacking vital problems, entitled the university to its high privileges. Hence, upon inception as a master of arts a man did not cease to be called a “scholar”—a word which has consequently come to imply sound learning outside the three professions. It was the elucidation of theology which was above all desired and expected from the university; and the faculty of theology was organized more like a learned academy than as a seminary. The constitutions of universities are various and for the most part complicated. In Paris there were in each faculty three degrees, those of bachelor, licentiate, and master or doctor. Three years’ study were required for a master in arts, and he must be twenty-one years of age. Five years’ study more were required for the first degree in theology. The instruction was entirely by lectures, and the only exercises were disputations. Each faculty was presided over by a dean, and had two bachelors and other servants. The four faculties met in congregation, and were presided over by the vice-chancellor. The position of chancellor was merely formal. For the purposes of administration, all the scholars, including the masters of arts, were divided into four nations, of Gaul, Picardy, Normandy, and England. This was an arrangement not going back to the origin of the university, though students from the same country had from the first clubbed together. Each nation was governed by a proctor, and possessed a seal. The students were mostly gathered into different colleges, hostels, and pedagogies; and in 1459 the class of martinet, or unattached students, was abolished. The corporate institution in Paris and other northern universities embraced only the masters, not the other students, and for this reason it was not until late in the fourteenth century that, first in Germany, this body, called the studium generale, began to take the name of the universitas, or union—a word which had before and has since been used to include students of all grades. Along with the name of university, from before the restriction in its meaning, has always been associated the epithet of alma mater.—General council of the university. See council.—University extension, a scheme, originating in England, for extending the advantages of university instruction by means of lectures and classes at important centers.—University Test Act, an English statute of 1871 which abolished the subscribing to articles of faith, etc., before taking degrees.

universityless (ū-nī-vēr’sī-ti-lēs), a. [< univcrsity + -less.] Having no university. Fuller

universityologist (ū-nī-vēr-sō-lōj’i-jist), n. [< univcrsology + -ist.] One versed in universology. [Rare.]

universology (ū-nī-vēr-sō-lōj’i-jī), n. [< L. universum, the universe (see universe), + Gr. λόγος, < λόγος, speak; see -ology.] The science of the universe, or of the whole system of created things; a science covering the whole ground of philosophy, of the sciences in their general aspects, and of social polity, or the collective life of the human world. H. Spencer.

univocal (ū-nī-vō’kāl), a. and n. [cf. F. univocal = Sp. univoco = Pg. It. univoco; < L. univocus, having but one meaning; < L. unus, one, + vocare, voice, meaning; see vocal.] 1. a. 1. Having one meaning only; having the meaning unmistakable; opposed to equivocal.

So does every exercise of the life of Christ kindle its own fires, inspires breath into itself, and makes an univocal production of itself in a differing subject.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 23.

2. In music, having a unisonous sound.—3. Certain; not to be doubted or mistaken. [Rare.]

The true mothers, the univocal parents of their productions.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, n. 3.

4. Producing something of its own nature; as, univocal generation; a univocal cause. [Rare.]

Which conceit . . . is injurious unto philosophy, . . . making putrefactive generations correspondent unto seminal productions, and conceiving in equivocal effects an univocal conformity unto the efficient.

Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Err., ii. 6.

Univocal action. See action.—Univocal generation, normal or regular generation, in distinction from equivocal or spontaneous generation.—Univocal predication. See predication.

II. n. A word having only one signification or meaning; a generic word, or a word predicable of many different species, as fish, tree. Imp. Dict.

univocally (ū-nī-vō’kāl-i), adv. In a univocal manner; in one sense or tenor; not equivocally; unmistakably.

The same word may be employed either univocally, equivocally, or analogously.

Whately.

univocation (ū-nī-vō’kā’shon), n. [= F. univocation = Sp. univocacion = Pg. univocação = It. univocazione; < L. univocus, having but one meaning; see univocal.] Agreement of name and meaning. Whiston.—Limited univocation, univocation of a genus, species, difference, property, or accident; opposed to transcendent univocation, such univocation as is possessed by ens, good, true, relation, absolute, etc.

unjaundiced (un-jān’dist), a. Not jaundiced; hence, not affected by envy, jealousy, etc.

An unjaundiced eye. Comper, To Dr. Darwin.

unjealous (un-jē’lūs), a. Not jealous; not suspicious or mistrustful. Clarendon.

unjoin (un-join’), v. t. [ME. unjoynen; < un-2 + join.] To separate; to disjoin.

Tigris and Euphrates unjoinen and departen hir watres. Chaucer, Boethius, v. meter 1.

unjoint (un-joint’), v. t. [< un-2 + joint.] To disjoint; take apart the joints of; as, to unjoint a fishing-rod.

Unjoint that bytture. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 265.

Unjointing the bones. Fuller, Holy War, p. 237.

unjointed (un-join’ted), a. 1. Having no joints, nodes, or articulations; inarticulate.—2. Unjoined; disjointed; disconnected.

This bald unjointed chat. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2. 65.

3. Unhinged; out of joint; disarticulated; luxated or dislocated, as a joint.

unjoyful (un-join’fūl), a. [< ME. unjoyful; < un-1 + joyful.] Joyless; unpleasant.

Thilke thinges . . . shollen ben unjoyful to thee.

Chaucer, Boethius, ii. prose 5.

Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, ii. 1.

2†. For fear that; in case; lest.

Beware you do not once the same gainsay,
Unless with death he do your rashness pay.
Greene, Alphonsus, v.

[By omission of a verb, implied in the context, unless may have the force of 'except,' 'but for': as,

Here nothing breeds
Unless the nightly owl.
Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3. 97.

Let not wine,
Unless in sacrifice or rites divine,
Be ever known of shepherds.
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, v. 5.]

= Syn. Except, Unless. Except could once be used as a synonym for unless, but the words have now drawn entirely apart. Unless is only a conjunction; except is only a preposition. Except introduces an exception to a statement which is otherwise general: it may be followed by a clause when connection is made by a particle, as when, that, as, while, or especially another preposition: the omission of such connective makes the structure archaic. Unless introduces a clause, or the abbreviation of a clause, indicating a limitation or condition.

unlessoned (un-lēs'nd), a. Not taught; not instructed. Shak., M. of V., iii. 2. 161. [Rare.]

Unona (ū-nō'ūā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus filius, 1781); altered from NL. Anona, the name of a related genus.] A genus of plants, of the order Anonaceae, type of the tribe Anonae. It differs from Asimina, the papaw of the United States, in its commonly moniliform fruit, and from others of its tribe in its corolla with flat open petals, and in having numerous ovules in a single series. The 25 species are natives of tropical Asia, except 4 or 5 which are African. They are trees or shrubby climbers, usually with large flowers solitary or near the axils, their petals often 2 or 3 inches long, reaching 6 inches in U. longiflora, a shrub of Assam. Their young branches are often silky or velvety, with brown, gray, golden, or reddish hairs, or, in U. Desmos and U. discolor, are covered with white dots or tubercles. Many species yield an aromatic bark and fruit, used as a stimulant and febrifuge. U. discolor, cultivated in India, and native also in China and the Malay archipelago, is a small tree or shrub with polymorphous leaves, odorless yellow flowers with silky petals in several varieties, and purple moniliform fruit with fleshy joints, resembling small grapes; from the unripe fruit the Chinese make a purple dye. U. viridiflora, a gigantic climber of Indian forests, is remarkable for the bright-green color of its large flowers. For the former U. hamata, now Artabotrys odoratissima, see tail-grape; for the former U. (now Cananga) odorata, see Cananga. See also Ucarina and Yulopia, with which the species have been much confused.

4. The meadow-saffron, Colchicum autumnale, whose flowers spring up suddenly without leaves.

II. a. It. Starting up suddenly; quickly rising.

With upstart haire and staring eyes dismay. Spenser, F. Q., III. x. 54.

2. Suddenly raised to prominence or consequence; parvenu; as, "a race of upstart creatures," Milton, P. L., ii. 834.

New, up-start Gods, of yester-dayes device. Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Decay.

An upstart institution so totally misapprehended by secular power and interest. Eccliqu, True Religion, II. 128.

3. Characteristic of a parvenu; new and pretentious.

Think you that we can brook this upstart pride? Marlborough, Edward the Second, i. 4.

The wronged landscape coldly stands aloof, Refusing friendship with the upstart roof. Lowell, Fitz Adam's Story.

upstaunch, v. t. See upstanch.

upstay (up-stā'), v. t. To sustain; support. Milton, P. L., ix. 430.

upstep (up-stēp'), v. i. To step up; move upward. Hynd Horn (Child's Ballads, IV. 26).

upstir (up'stēr), n. Commotion; tumult; insurrection. Sir J. Choke, The Hurt of Sedition.

upstream (up-strēm'), v. i. To stream, flow, or flame up; as, upstreaming flames.

up-stream (up'strēm'), prep. phr. as adv. Toward the higher part of a stream; against the current; as, to row up-stream.

up-stream (up'strēm'), prep. phr. as a. [< up-stream, adv.] Of or pertaining to the upper part of a stream; moving against the current.

An upstream wind increases the surface resistance. Gov. Report on Miss. River, 1861 (rep. 1876), p. 270.

up-street (up'strēt'), prep. phr. as adv. At or toward the higher part or upper end of a street.

upsun (up'sun), n. The time during which the sun is above the horizon; the time between sunrise and sunset. Fountainhall, (Imp. Dict.)

upsurge (up-sērj'), v. i. To surge up. The Century, XXVI. 130. [Rare.]

upswarm (up-swärm'), v. I. intrans. To rise in swarms; swarm up.

Upswarming showed On the high battlement their glittering spears. Cooper, Hiad, xii.

II. trans. To cause to rise in a swarm or swarms; raise in a swarm. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 2. 30.

upsway (up-swā'), v. t. To sway or swing up; brandish. [Rare.]

That right-hand Giant 'gan his club upsway. Scott, Vision of Don Roderick, The Vision, st. 16.

up-sweep (up'swēp), n. A sweeping upward; as, the up-sweep of a curve; the up-sweep of an arch. [Rare.]

upswell (up-swēl'), v. i. To swell up; rise up. Wordsworth, Ode, 1814.

upsyturvy (up-si-ter'vi), adv. [A variation of topsyturvy, substituting up for top.] Upside down; topsyturvy. [Rare.]

There found I all was upsyturvy turn'd. Greene, James IV., iii. 3.

uptails-all (up'tāl'z-āl), n. Confusion; riot; hence, revellers. (Davies.)

uptake (up-tāk'), v. t. I. To take up; take into the hand. Spenser, F. Q., II. ii. 11.—2. To succeed; help.

The right hand of my iust man uptake thee. Wyclif, Isa. xli. 10.

uptake (up-tāk), n. [< uptake, v.] 1. The act of taking up; lifting.

To this ascensional movement (in cyclones) undoubtedly must be attributed the rain and cloud which we find there—rain near the centre, where the ascensional impulse is strongest; cloud round the outside, where the uptake is less strong. Science, XI. 215.

2. Perceptive power; apprehension; conception; as, he is quick in the uptake. Scott, Old Mortality, vii. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]—3. The upcast pipe from the smoke-box of a steam-boiler, leading to the chimney.—Gleg at the uptake. See gleg.

uptaker (up-tāk'ér), n. [ME. < uptake + -er.] A helper; a supporter. Wyclif, Ps. lxxxviii.

uptear (up-tār'), v. t. To tear up. Milton, P. L., vi. 663.

upthrow (up-thrō'), v. t. To throw up; elevate.

upthrow (up'thrō), n. [< upthrow, v.] An upheaval; an uplift; in mining, the opposite of downtthrow. Where a fault has occurred which has been attended by an up-and-down movement of the rock on each side, the displacement in the upward direction is called the upthrow, and that in the downward direction the downtthrow. As a result of this motion, under great pressure, of the two adjacent rock-faces, it is sometimes observed that the bedding of the formation has been influenced in its position along the line of the fault, and to a greater or less distance from it, the dip being downward on the downthrow side and upward on the upthrow side of the fault. This is called by the miner "dipping to the downthrow" and "rising to the upthrow." Also used attributively.

We rarely meet with a fissure which has been made a true fault with an upthrow and downthrow side.

Geikie, Geol. Sketches, xi.

upthrust (up'thrust), n. A thrust in an upward direction; in geol., an upheaval; an uplift. A term rarely used, and then generally as meaning a thrusting or lifting upward of a mass of rock more violent in its motion and more local in character than is generally understood to be the case when the term upheaval or uplift is used. Thus, the uplift of a continent; the upthrust of a mass of eruptive or intrusive rock. Also used attributively.

To this mass, which I have no doubt is an upthrust portion of the old crystalline floor, succeeds another mass of "spotted rock."

Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLVI. 216.

upthunder (up-thun'dér), v. i. To send up a loud thunder-like noise. [Rare.]

Central fires through nether seas upthundering.

Coleridge, To the Departing Year.

uptie† (up-tí'), v. t. To tie or twist up; wind up. Spenser, F. Q., VI. iv. 24.

uptill† (up-tíl'), prep. [< up + till]. On; against; up to.

She [the nightingale] . . . as all forlorn,

Lean'd her breast up-till a thorn;

And then sang the down-fall stilly; . . .

"Fie, fie, fie," now would she cry;

"Tereu, tereu," by and by!

Shak., Pass. Pilgrim, xxi. 10.

uptilt (up-tilt'), v. t. To tilt up; chiefly in the past participle.

He finds that he has crossed the up-tilted formations, and has reached the ancient granitic and crystalline rocks.

Geikie, Geol. Sketches, ix.

up-to-date (up'tó-dát'), a. Extending to the present time; inclusive of or making use of the latest facts; as, an up-to-date account. [Colloq.]

A good up-to-date English work on the islands.

The Academy, No. 222, Feb. 4, 1888, p. 73.

uptoss (up-tos'), v. t. To toss or throw up, as the head, with a sudden motion. St. Nicholas, XVII. 866. [Rare.]

uptossed, uptost (up-tost'), a. 1. Tossed upward.—2. Agitated; harassed.

Uptost by madning passion and strife.

Jones Very, Poems, p. 124.

up-town (up'toun), prep. pler. as adv. To or in the upper part of a town. [U. S.] up-town (up'toun'), prep. pler. as a. Situated in or belonging to the upper part of a town: as, an up-town residence. [Colloq., U. S.]

uptrace (up-trás'), v. t. To trace up; investigate; follow out. Thomson, Summer, l. 1746.

uptrain† (up-trán'), v. t. To train up; educate. Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 27.

uptrill (up-tríl'), v. t. To sing or trill in a high voice.

But when the long-breathed singer's uptrilled strain

Bursts in a squall, they gape for wonderment.

Coleridge, In a Concert-Room. (Davies.)

upturn (up-térn'), v. i. trans. To turn up; as, to upturn the ground in plowing.

With lusty strokes upturn'd the flashing waves.

Cuimper, Odyssey, xiii.

II. intrans. To turn up.

The hidden eye of the sidelong shark

Upturned patiently. Lowell, The Sirens.

upturning (up-tér'ning), n. The act of turning or throwing up, or the state of being upturned.

There was at this time (as the mammalian æge draws to a close) no chaotic upturning, but only the opening of creation to its fullest expansion.

Baerson, Origin of World, p. 235.

Upucerthia (u-pú-sér'thi-ä), n. [NL. (Isidore Geoffroy St. Hilaire, 1832; also Uppucerthia, the same, 1838), also Huppucerthia, in full form Uppucerthia (Agassiz, 1846), < NL. Upu (pu) + Certhia, q. v.] A genus of Neotropical birds, of the family Dendrocolaptidae. There are 6 or 8 species, of moderate size and general shape of the bill, which is as long as the head or longer, and nearly straight or much curved. The type is U. dumetoria of (Chili, Patagonia, and parts of the Argentine Republic. Copreotis (Cabanis and Heinke, 1859) is a strict synonym; and the species with the nearly straight bill (U. ruficauda) has been the type of a genus Ochetorhynchus (Meyer, 1832).

Upucerthidæ (u-pú-sér'thi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (first as Uppucerthidæ, D'Orbigny), < Upucerthia + -idæ.] A family of birds: same as Dendrocolaptidae or *Anabidae*¹.

Upupa (ū'pū-pū), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1748), < L. upupa = Gr. ὑπού, the hoopoe; see *hoop*³, hoopoe.] The only extant genus of Upupidae. There are several species, as the common hoopoe of Africa and Europe, U. egypt. See cut under hoopoe.

Upupidæ (ū'pū-pū-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Upupa + -idæ.] 1. A family of tenuirostral picarian or non-picarine birds, of which the genus Upupa is the type. The family was founded by Bonaparte in 1838, but its limits vary with different authors. Gray makes it cover 3 subfamilies, Upupinae, Irisorinae, and Epinachinae; but it is now restricted to the first of these. 2. A family of upupoid picarian birds, of which Upupa is the only living genus, of terrestrial habits, with non-metallic plumage, short square tail, and large erectile compressed circular crest; the true hoopoes, as distinguished from the wood-hoopoes or Irisoridae.

upupoid (ū'pū-pū-oid), a. [< Upupa + -oid.] Resembling a hoopoe; of or pertaining to the Upupoidæ.

Upupoidæ (ū'pū-pū-oid-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Upupa + -oidæ.] A superfamily of tenuirostral picarian birds, approaching the passerines in many respects, but most nearly related to the hornbills, containing both the terrestrial and the arboreal hoopoes (not the plume-birds; see Epinachinae). The group is peculiar to the Old World, and is chiefly African. There are 2 families, Upupidæ and Irisoridae.

upwaffed (up-wáf'ted), a. Borne up; carried aloft with a waving or undulatory motion. Cowper, Iliad, viii.

upwall (up-wál'), v. t. [ME. upwallen; < up + wall.] To wall up; inclose with a wall. Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 17.

upward (up'wärd'), a. and n. [*< ME. upward, < AS. upwærd, upward, upright, < up, up, + -wærd = E. -ward. Cf. upward, adv.] I. a. Directed or turned to a higher place; having an ascending direction, literally or figuratively.

Thus far our fortune keeps an upward course.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 3. l.

About her feet were little beagles seen,

That watch'd with upward eyes the motions of their queen.

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., l. 1254.

Upward irrigation. See irrigation.

II. n. The top; the height. [Rare.]

The extreme upward of his head.

Shak., Lear, v. 3. 136.

upward, upwards (up'wärd, -wärdz), adv. [< ME. upward, upward, also upwardes, < AS. upward*, upwardes (= D. opwärts = MLG. upward, upward, also upwardes = G. aufwärts, < up, up, + -ward = E. -ward. Cf. upward, a.] 1. Toward a higher place; in an ascending course: opposed to downward.

This Nicholas sat ay as stille as stoon,

And ever gaped upward into the air.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 287.

I felt to his knees, and they were as cold as any stone; and so upward and upward, and all was as cold as any stone.

Shak., Hen. V., ii. 3. 27.

2. Toward heaven and God.

Crizge epward to Crist and to his clene moder.

Piers Plowman (A), v. 262.

Whose mind should always, as the fire, aspire upwards to heavenly things.

Sir T. More, Life of Piers (Int. to Utopia, p. lxxvii.)

3. With respect to the higher part; in the upper parts.

Upward man, and downward fish.

Milton.

4. Toward the source or origin: as, trace the stream upward.

And trace the muses upward to their spring.

Pope, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, l.

5. More: used indefinitely.

Children of th[e] age of .xii. or .xiii. yeares or upward are divided into two companies, whereof the one breake the stones into smalle pieces, and the other cary furth that which is broken.

R. Eden, tr. of Dioscorus Siculus (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 369].

I am a very foolish fond old man,
Fourscore and upward. Shak., Lear, iv. 7. 61.

6. On; onward.

From the age of xliiii. yerres upward.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, l. 16.

Upward of, more than; above; as, upward of ten years have elapsed; upward of a hundred men were present.

I have been your wife . . .

Upward of twenty years.

Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4. 36.

upwardly (up'wärd-li), adv. In an upward manner or direction; upward.

A filament was fixed to a young upwardly inclined leaf.

Darwin, Movement in Plants, iv.

upwards, adv. See upward.

upways (up'wāz), adv. [< up + ways for -wise.] Upward. [Colloq.]

Distance measured upways from O A indicates roughly the degree of hardness. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXVII. 653.

upwell (up-wel'), v. i. To upspring; issue forth, as water from a fountain. Scribner's Mag., VIII. 435.

upwhirl (up-hwér'l'), v. i. intrans. To rise upward in a whirl; whirl upward.

II. trans. To raise upward in a whirling course. Milton, P. L., iii. 493.

upwind (up-wind'), v. t. To wind up; roll up; couvolve. Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 15.

up-wind (up'wind'), prep. phr. as adv. Against or in the face of the wind. [Colloq.]

Snipe nearly always rise against and go away up-wind, as closely as possible.

Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 256.

upwreathe (up-rēth'), v. i. To rise with a curling motion; curl upward. Longfellow, Building of the Ship. [Rare.]

upyaft. An obsolete preterit of uppire.

ur (ér), interj. [Intended to represent a meaningless utterance also denoted by uh. er, etc.] Used substantively in the quotation.

And when you stick on conversation's hurrs

Don't strew your pathway with those dreadful urs.

O. W. Holmes, Urania.

uracanot, n. [Another form of hurricane, with an Italian-seeming plural uracani: see hurricane, hurricane.] A hurricane.

Jamaica is almost as large as Boriquen. It is extremely subject to the uracani, which are such terrible gusts of Winde that nothing can resist them.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 903.

urachus (ū'ra-kus), n.; pl. urachi (-ki). [NL., < Gr. οὐράχιος, the urinary canal of a fetus, < οὐρον, urine; see urine.] In anat., a fibrous cord extending from the fundus of the bladder to the umbilicus. It represents in the adult a part of the sac of the allantois and associate allantoic vessels of the fetus, whose cavities have become obliterated. It is that intra-abdominal section of the navel-string which is constituted by so much of the allantoic sac and the hypogastric arteries as becomes impervious, the section remaining pervious being the bladder and superior vesical arteries. It sometimes remains pervious, as a malformation, when a child may urinate by the navel. See also ureter.

uræa, n. Plural of uræum.

uræmia, uræmic. See uræmia, uræmic.

uræum (ū-rē'um), n.; pl. uræa (-ä). [NL., < Gr. οὐραιον, the hinder part, the tail; neut. of οὐραιος, of the tail, < οὐρά, tail.] In ornith., the entire posterior half of a bird: opposed to stethæum. [Rare.]

uræus (ū-rē'us), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐραϊος, of the tail; see uræum.] The sacred serpent, either the head and neck, or sometimes the entire form, of a serpent, represented by the ancient Egyptians upon the head-dresses of divinities and royal personages, as an emblem of supreme power. It also occurs frequently on either side of a winged solar disk, emblematic of the supremacy of the sun, of good over evil, or of Horus over Set. The actual basis of the symbol is supposed to be the Egyptian asp or cobra, Naja haje. See also asp under asp.

ural (ū'ral), n. A hypnotic remedy, formed by the combination of chloral hydrate with urethane.

Ural-Altai (ū'ral-al-tā'ik), a. See Altaic.

Uralian (ū-rā'li-an), a. [< Ural (see def.) (Russ. Uralū) + -ian.] Relating to the river Ural, or to the Ural Mountains, in Russia and Siberia.

Uralic (ū-rā'lik), a. [< Ural (see def.) + -ic.] Pertaining to the Ural Mountains or river Ural.

uralite (ū-rā-lit), n. [< Ural + -ite.] The name given by G. Rose to a mineral which has the crystalline form of augite, but the physical properties and especially the cleavage and specific gravity of hornblende. Uralite is generally called a paramorph of hornblende, but this paramorphism is frequently accompanied by some chemical change, especially the elimination of more or less lime, which appears intermingled with the hornblende in the form of calcite or epidote. See uralitization. — Uralite-syenite, a variety of syenite, from Turgojak in the Ural Mountains, in which the orthoclase exhibits a very peculiar form of cleavage. There are three cleavage-planes, instead of two as in the ordinary orthoclase, and in all of these lie minute scales of specular iron. Jerninajeff.

uralitic (ū-rā-lit'ik), a. [< uralite + -ic.] In lithol., having the characters of uralite in a greater or less degree; containing, or consisting wholly or in part of, uralite. See uralitization.

uralitization (ū-rā-lit-i-zā'shon), n. The paramorphic change of augite to hornblende. See uralite. This form of metamorphism is of very common occurrence, especially among the diabases, some varieties of which rock are, for this reason, called uralite-diorite; the same is true also of the porphyries and porphyrites, giving rise to the name uralite-porphry and uralite-porphryite.

uralitize (ū-rā-lit-i-zē), v. t.; pret. and pp. uralitized, ppr. uralitizing. [< uralite + -ize.] In lithol., to convert into uralite.

uran (ū-ran), n. Same as uran.

uranate (ū-rā-nāt), n. [< uranic + -ate.] A salt formed by the union of uranic acid with a metallic oxide.

uran-glimmer (ū-rān-glim'gr), n. Same as uranite.

Urania (ū-rā'ni-ā), n. [NL., < L. Urania, < Gr. Οὐρανία, one of the Muses, lit. 'the Heavenly One,' fem. of οὐρανός, heavenly, < οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the sky; see Uranus.] 1. In Gr. myth., the Muse of astronomy and celestial forces, and the arbitress of fate, second only to Calliope in the company of the Muses. Her usual attributes are a globe, which she often holds in her hand, and a little star or a compass for indicating the course of the stars. See Muse. 2. A genus of large and handsome diurnal moths, typical of the family Uraniidae, as U. fulgens. Fa- bricius, 1808. They have a short but stout body, anterior wings with a very oblique external margin, and dentate hind wings with long tails. They greatly resemble butterflies of the genus Papilio, and are sometimes called butterfly hawk-moths. They occur most commonly in tropical and subtropical America. A few species, however, have been found in Madagascar and on the east coast of Africa. The larva is cylindrical with long delicate setae, and the pupa is enclosed within a thin cocoon.

3. In ornith., a genus of humming-birds. Fitzinger, 1863.

Uranian (ū-rā'ni-an), a. [< Uranus + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the planet Uranus.

The most singular circumstance attending the whole Uranian system.

Ball, Story of the Heavens, p. 169. (Eneide, Diect.)

uranic (ū-ran'ik), a. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, the sky (see Uranus), + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the heavens; celestial; astronomical.

On I know not what telluric or uranic principles. Carlyle.

uranic (ū-ran'ik), a. [< uranium + -ic.] Pertaining to, obtained from, or containing uranium; noting salts of which the base is uranium sesquioxide, or in which uranium oxide acts as an acid.

uraniferous (ū-rā-nif'e-rus), a. Containing or characterized by the presence of uranium.

Uranidiæ (ū-rā-ni'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), < Urania + -idæ.] A family of moths, much resembling butterflies of the family Papilionidae, belonging between the Sesiidae and Zygaenidae. In Westwood's system it included the forms now separated in the family Castniidae. The species are all tropical. The principal genera are Urania and Nyctalarmon.

uraninite (ū-rā-ni'it), n. [< uranic + -ite.] A mineral of a pitch-black color and very heavy, having when unaltered a specific gravity of 9.5. It usually occurs massive, rarely in regular octahedrons, and is commonly met with in granitic rocks. Its exact chemical composition is uncertain, but it consists essentially of the oxide of uranium (U₃O₈), also thorium, lead, and other elements in small amount, with, further, from 1 to 2.5 percent of nitrogen. It is the chief source of uranium; and it is also the only mineral in the primitive crust of the earth in which the element nitrogen is known to exist. Also called pitch-blende.

uranion (ū-rā'ni-on), n. A musical instrument, invented in 1810 by Buschmann. It consisted of a graduated set of pieces of wood which could be sounded by pressure against a revolving wheel. It was played from a keyboard.

uranisci, n. Plural of uraniscus.

uraniscotitis (ū-rā-nis-kō-ni'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. οὐρανισκός, the roof of the mouth (see uraniscus), + -itis.] Inflammation of the uraniscus or palate.

uraniscoplasty (ū-rā-nis-kō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. οὐρανισκός, the roof of the mouth, + πλαστική, form, mold, shape.] Plastic surgery of the palate. Also uranoplasty.

uraniscorraphy (ū-rā-nis-kō-rā'fi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανισκός, the roof of the mouth, + ραφή, a seam, a sewing, < ράπτω, sew.] Suture of the palate.

uraniscus (ū-rā-nis'kus), n.; pl. uranisci (-sī). [NL., < Gr. οὐρανισκός, the roof of the mouth, lit. 'a little vault,' dim. of οὐρανός, the vault of heaven; see Uranus.] In anat., the roof, vault, or canopy of the mouth—that is, the palate. See cut under palate.

uranite (ū-rā-nit), n. [< uranium + -ite.] An ore of uranium, of an emerald-green, grass-green, leek-green, or yellow color, transparent or subtranslucent. Mineralogically it includes two species—autunite, a phosphate of uranium and calcium (lime uranite), and torbernite, a phosphate of uranium and copper (copper uranite). Also called uran-glimmer and uran-mica.

uranitic (ū-rā-nit'ik), a. [< uranite + -ic.] Pertaining to or containing uranite.

uranium (ū-rā'ni-um), n. [NL.; so called in allusion to the planet Uranus, and in compliment to Sir W. Herschel, its discoverer; < Uranus, q. v.] Chemical symbol, U; atomic weight, 240. A metal discovered by Klaproth, in 1789, in a mineral which had been long known, and called pitch-blende, but which was supposed to be an ore of either zinc or iron. The metal itself was first isolated by Peligot, that which Klaproth had supposed to be a metal proving, on further examination, to be an oxide. Metallic uranium as obtained by the reduction of the chloride has a specific gravity of 18.7, and resembles nickel in color. Uranium is far from being a widely distributed element; its combinations are few in number, and most of them rare. Pitch-blende is the most abundant and important of them, consisting chiefly of uranoso-uranic acid, with usually a considerable percentage of impurities of various kinds, especially sulphuret of lead, arsenic, etc. Uranium belongs to the chromium group of elementary bodies. Sodium diuranate, or uranium-yellow, is quite an important yellow pigment, which is used on glass and porcelain, and in making yellow glass. Uranium pigments are much rarer and more expensive than those of which chromium forms the essential part.

Butterfly Hawk-moth (Urania fulgens), two thirds natural size.

uran-mica (ū-rān-mī'kū), n. [< uranic + mica.] Same as uranite.

uran-ocher (ū-rān-ō kēr), n. [< uranic + ocher.] A yellow earthy oxide of uranium. It occurs in soft friable masses, disseminated or incrusting, along with pitch-blende or uraninite, in the granites of Saxony and France.

uranographic (ū-rā-nō-grā'fik), a. [< uranograph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to uranography. Also ouranographic.

uranographical (ū-rā-nō-grā'fi-kāl), a. [< uranographic + -al.] Same as uranographic. Also ouranographical.

uranographist (ū-rā-nō-grā'fist), n. [< uranographic + -ist.] One versed in uranography. Also ouranographist.

uranography (ū-rā-nō-grā'fi), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + γραφία, < γράφω, write.] That branch of astronomy which consists in the description of the fixed stars, their positions, magnitudes, colors, etc.; uranology. Also ouranography.

uranolite (ū-rā-nō-lit), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + λίθος, stone.] A meteorite. At an early period in the history of the study of meteorites they were sometimes called uranolites, more generally acrolites; in later years the name meteorite has become generally adopted wherever English is spoken, and the same is true for most of the other European languages.

uranology (ū-rā-nō-lō'jī), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + λογία, < λόγος, speak; see -ology.] The knowledge of the heavens.

uranometry (ū-rā-nō-mē'tri), n.; pl. uranometries (-triz). [< Gr. οὐρανός, heaven, + μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] 1. The measurement of stellar distances.—2. A description of the principal fixed stars arranged in constellations, with their designations, positions, and magnitudes.

The uranometries of Bayer [1603], Flamsteed, Arctander, Heis, and Gould give the lucid stars of one or both hemispheres laid down on maps.

Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 135.

uranoplasty (ū-rā-nō-plas-ti), n. Same as uraniscoplasty.

uranoscope (ū-rā-nō-skō'p), n. [NL. Uranoscopus.] A fish of the genus Uranoscopus; a star-gazer. See cut under star-gazer.

Uranoscopidæ (ū-rā-nō-skō'p-i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Richardson, 1848), < Uranoscopus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, whose type genus is Uranoscopus, the star-gazers. The family has been variously limited. By American ichthyologists it is restricted to those species, chiefly inhabiting warm temperate seas of both hemispheres, which have an oblong body, cuboid head with nearly vertical eyes and mouth, oblong and thin, complete jugular ventral fins, and the lateral line running near the dorsal fin. See cut under star-gazer.

Uranoscopus (ū-rā-nō-skō'pus), n. [NL. (Gronovius; Linnaeus, 1766), < L. uranoscopus, < Gr. οὐρανισκός, a fish called otherwise καλλιόναρος (see Callionymus), lit. 'observing the heavens,' < οὐρανός, the heavens, + σκοπέω, observe, view.] The typical genus of Uranoscopidæ. U. scaber is a Mediterranean fish, known to the ancients.

uranoscopy (ū-rā-nō-skō'pī), n. [< Gr. οὐρανισκός, the heavens, + σκοπέω, observe, view.] Contemplation of the heavenly bodies.

uranostomatostomy (ū-rā-nō-stōm'a-to-skō'pī), n. [< Gr. οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the roof of the mouth, + στόμα (τ-), the mouth, + σκοπέω, view.] Inspection of the roof of the mouth or palate; as, 'phrenopathic uranostomatostomy.' Medical News, XLIX, 559. [Rare.]

uranothorite (ū-rā-nō-thō'rīt), n. A variety of the thorium silicate; thorite containing a small percentage of oxide of uranium.

uranous (ū-rā-nus), a. [< uranium + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the metal uranium; noting salts of which the base is uranium protoxide.

Uranus (ū-rā-nus), n. [< L. Uranus, < Gr. Οὐρανός, Uranus, a personification of οὐρανός, the vault of heaven, the sky, heaven, the heavens, = Skt. Varuna, a deity of highest rank in the Veda, later a god of the waters, < √ rar, cover, encompass.] 1. In classical myth., the son of Ge or Gaia (the Earth), and by her the father of the Titans, Cyclopes, etc. He hated his children, and confined them in Tartarus; but on the instigation of Gaia, Kronos, the youngest of the Titans, overthrew and dethroned him. Also written Ouranos.

2. In astron., the outermost but one of the planets, appearing to the naked eye as a faint star. It was discovered as a moving body with a disk, March 13th, 1781, by Sir W. Herschel, but had previously been observed twenty times as a star by different observers. These are called the ancient observations of Uranus. The planet, seen with a telescope of the first class, appears as a small bluish disk with two bands. The diameter perpendicular to these is less than that parallel to them by $\frac{1}{2}$. It is a little smaller than Neptune, its diameter being 31,000 miles; its mass is $\frac{1}{22500}$ of the sun, or 14.7 times that of the earth; its density is therefore about 1.4, being a little more than that of Jupiter. It is about 19.2 times as far from the sun as the earth is; and its period of revolution is about eighty-four years and one week. It has four satellites—Ariel, Umbriel, Titania, and Oberon—of which the first two are extremely difficult telescopic objects. They revolve in one plane nearly perpendicular to that of the orbit of the planet.

urao (ō-rā'ō), n. [= F. urao: S. Amer. name.] A native name for natron found in the dried-up lakes and river-courses of South America: same as the trona of the Egyptian lakes. See natron, trona.

Urapterygidae (ū-rap-te-rij'i-dō), n. pl. [NL. (Guénée, 1857), < Urapteryx (-pteryg-) + -idae.] A family of geometrid moths, typified by the genus Urapteryx, having the fore wings always acuminate and the hind wings usually caudate. The species are mainly tropical, but the family is represented in all parts of the world. The larvae are much elongated, and are furnished with protuberances, especially on the eighth segment. The pupae are inclosed in loose net-like cocoons suspended from leaves. Fourteen genera and more than 100 species have been described. Charodes and Oxydia are the other principal genera. Also Urapterygidae, Oourapterygidae, Oourapterygidae, etc.

Urapteryx (ū-rap'te-riks), n. [NL. (Boisduval, 1832), < Gr. urpa, tail, + πτερυξ, wing.] A genus of geometrid moths, typical of the family Urapterygidae, having the body moderately slender, the third joint of the palpi indistinct, the fore wings acute and triangular, and the hind wings with a caudiform angle on the exterior border. The species are found in tropical America, Asia, and Europe. U. sambucaria is the only European one.

urari (ū-rā'ri), n. Same as curari.

urarize (ū-rā'riz), a. Same as curarized.

urate (ū-rāt), n. [< ur-ic + -ate]. A salt of uric acid. See uric.

uratic (ū-rat'ik), n. [< urate + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the urates.—Uratic diathesis, in med., a condition in which there is a tendency to the deposition of urates from the blood in the joints and other parts of the body; a predisposition to gout.

uratoma (ū-rā-tō'mū), n. A deposit of urates in the tissues; tophus.

uratosi (ū-rā-tō'sis), n. In med., the condition in which a deposition of crystalline urates takes place in the tissues.

Uranges (ū-rā'jēz), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1851), < Gr. urpa, tail, + αἴγῃ, light, sheen, pl. the eyes. Cf. Lipangus.] A genus of African glossy starlings, having the tail in the typical species greatly lengthened. It is based upon the glossy thrush of Latham (1783), which is the same bird that served as type of the genera Lamprolani (Temminck) and Juida (Lesson). U. caudatus inhabits western and urbane (ēr-bān'), a. [< L. urbanus, of or pertaining to a city or city life, hence refined, polished, urbane; see urban.] Urbane is to urban as humane is to human.] 1. Of or belonging to a city or town; urban. [Rare.]

Though in no sense national, he [Horace] was, more truly than any has ever been since, still the same combination of circumstances produced Béranger, an urbane or city poet. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 239.

2. Civil; courteous; polite; usually, in a stronger sense, very polite; suave; elegant or refined: as, a man of urbane manners.

A more civil and urbane kind of life.

World of Wonders (1608).

So I the world abused—in fact, to me

Urbane and civil as a world could be.

Crabbe, Works, VIII. 159.

=Syn. 2. Civil, Courteous, etc. See polite.

urbanely (ēr-bān'li), adv. In an urbane manner; courteously; politely; suavely.

Urbanist (ēr'ban-ist), n. [< Urban (L. Urbanus) (see def.) + -ist.] 1. An adherent of Pope Urban VI., in opposition to whom a faction set up Clement VII. in 1378, thus beginning the great schism.—2. A member of a branch of the Clarisses following a mitigated rule. See Clarisse.

urbanity (ēr-ban'i-ti), n. [< F. urbanité = Sp. urbanidad = Pg. urbanidade = It. urbanità, < L. urbanitas (t-s), politeness, < urbanus, polite, urbane; see urbane, urban.] 1. The character of being urbane; that civility or courtesy of manners which is acquired by associating with well-bred people; politeness; suavity; courtesy.

So will they keep their measures true,

And make still their proportions new,

Till all become one harmony,

Of honour, and of courtesy,

True valour and urbanity.

B. Jonson, Love Restored.

Do you find all the urbanity in the French which the world gives us the honour of?

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 87.

2. A polished humor or facetiousness.

Moral doctrine, and urbanity, or well-mannered wit, are the two things which constitute the Roman satire.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, Ded.

If in this respect [the wrong use of pleasantry and humor] we strain the just measure of what we call urbanity, and are apt sometimes to take a bluffing rustic air, we may thank the ridiculous solemnity and sour humor of our pedagogues.

Shaftesbury, Wit and Humour, I. v.

=Syn. 1. Complaisance, amenity. See polite.

urbanize (ēr'ban-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. urbanized, prp. urbanizing. [< urban + -ize.] To render urbane. Howells, Foraine Travels, p. 9.

Urbicolæ (ēr-bik'ō-lē), n. pl. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), pl. of urbicola: see urbicolous.] A group of butterflies including forms now placed in the Hesperidae; the skippers.

urbicolous (ēr-bik'ō-lus), a. [< NL. urbicola, dwelling in a city, < L. urbs (urbis), city, + colere, dwell in, inhabit. Inhabiting a city; urban. Eclectic Rev. [Rare.]

urbi et orbi (ēr'bī et ör'bī), [L.: urbi, dat. of urbs, city (see urban); et, and; orbi, dat. of orbis, the world (see orb).] To the city (that is, Rome) and the world. The phrase is used in the publication of papal bulls, and (according to Larousse) by the Pope in pronouncing his blessing in the church of the Lateran on Maundy Thursday, Easter, and Ascension day.

Urceola (ēr-sē'ō-lā), n. [NL., < L. urceolus, a little pitcher or urn: see urceolus.] 1. [Roxburgh, 1798; so called with ref. to the form of the corolla.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Apocynaceæ, tribe Echitidæ, and subtribe Ecdysanthæ. It is characterized by an urceolate or globose corolla with somewhat induplicate valvate lobes (in its order a very rare arrangement). It includes 7 or 8 species, natives of the Malay peninsula and archipelago. They are shrubby climbers with opposite feather-veined leaves, and dense cymes of small flowers corymbosely panicle at the ends of the branches. U. elastica is the caudex-like vine of Sumatra and Formosa, a large climber, often with a trunk as thick as a man's body, covered with soft, thick, rugged bark. The milky juice which oozes from incisions separates, on standing in the open air, into a watery fluid and an elastic mass which has been used as a substitute for india-rubber. The greenish flowers are followed by twin roundish fruits with rough leathery skin, resembling oranges, and containing a tawny pulp which is eaten both by Europeans and by natives. 2. [L. c.] Eccles., same as cruc, 2.

urceolar (ēr'sē'ō-lār), a. [< urceolus + -ar]. Same as urceolate.

urceolareine, a. See urceolariine.

Urceolaria (ēr'sē'ō-lā-ri-ā), n. [NL., < L. urceolus, a little pitcher (see urceolus), + -aria.] 1. In bot.: (a) A small genus of gymnocarpous lichens, having a uniform crustaceous thallus and urceolate apothecia (whence the name).

U. scoposa and U. cinerea are used for dyeing. (b) Same as Urceolina.—2. [Lamarck, 1801.] In zool., the typical genus of Urceolariidæ, having the posterior acetabulum provided with an entire internal horny ring. U. mitra is found in fresh water as a parasite of planarian worms.

urceolarian (ēr'sē'ō-lā-ri-an), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to the family Urceolariidæ or having their characters.

II. n. An infusorian of this family.

Urceolariidæ (ēr'sē'ō-lā-ri-i-dē), n. pl. [< Urceolaria + -idæ.] A family of commensal or parasitic peritrichous infusorians, containing Urceolaria and a few other genera of fresh and salt water.

urceolariiform (ēr'sē'ō-lā-ri-i-fōrm), a. [< NL. Urceolaria + L. forma, form.] In bot., having the form of lichens of the genus Urceolaria.

urceolariine (ēr'sē'ō-lā-ri-in), a. In bot., of or pertaining to the genus Urceolaria. Also spelled urceolariene.

urceolate (ēr'sē'ō-lāt), a. [< urceolus + -ate].

1. Shaped like a pitcher; swelling out like a pitcher as respects the body, and contracted at the orifice, as a calyx or corolla.—2. Provided with or contained in an urceolus, as a rotifer.

urceole (ēr'sē'ōl), n. [< L. urceolus: see urceolus, urceola.] Same as cruc, 2.

urceoli, n. Plural of urceolus.

Urceolina (ēr'sē'ō-lī'nā), n. [NL. (Reichenbach), from the shape of the flowers; dim. of L. urceolus, an urn: see urceolus.] A genus of plants, of the order Amargyllidaceæ, tribe Amargyllææ, and subtribe Cyathiferae. It is characterized by broadly tubular or urn-shaped flowers with short lobes, an ovary with numerous ovules, and stamens more or less winged at the base, but not united into a cup as in the related genera. The 3 species are natives of the Andes, and are bulbous plants with flat-petioled leaves, ovate-oblong or narrower, and umbels of numerous showy flowers, usually yellow and green. The genus is also known as Urceolaria (Herbert, 1821). U. pendula and U. latifolia are border plants from Peru, known in cultivation as urn-flowers, and by the generic names. U. miniata, often called Pentlandia, is a very showy greenhouse plant, producing a solitary leaf and afterward an umbel of drooping vermilion flowers.

urceolus (ēr-sē'ō-lus), n.; pl. urceoli (-lī). [NL., < L. urceolus, a little pitcher, dim. of urceus, a pitcher: see urceus.] 1. A little pitcher or ewer.—2. In bot., any pitcher- or urn-shaped body.—3. In zool., the external tubular casing or sheathing of a wheel-animalcule; the zoöthecium of a rotifer, corresponding to the lorica of an infusorian. It may be gelatinous and hyaline, or mixed with hard foreign particles; in rare cases, as that of Meliceria, the urceolus is not organic, but fabricated from extrinsic matter. Ence. Brit., XXI. 5.

urceus (ēr'sē-us), n.; pl. urcei (-ī). [< L. urceus, a pitcher; cf. orea, a large vessel, Gr. ὑρῶνα, a pickle-jar.] Eccles., a ewer, usually of metal, to hold water for washing.

urchin (ēr'chin), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also urcheon, urcheone, urcheyn; < ME. urchin, urcheon, urcheone, urcheun, urcheon, urcheun, urcheone, < OE. irceon, erecon, herigon, herisson, herisson, herisson = Pr. erisson = Sp. erizo = Pg. erica, ourico = It. riccio, < L. ericiolus* (u-), < ericius, a hedgehog, < er, orig. hēr*, = Gr. χῆρ, a hedgehog: see ericius.] 1. A hedgehog. See hedgehog and Eriuceus.

Like sharp urchinous his here was growe,

Rom. of the Rose, l. 3135.

The common hedgehog or urchin.

2. A sea-urchin.

The urchins of the sea called echini.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, ix. 31.

3. An elf; a fairy: from the supposition that it sometimes took the form of a hedgehog.

Urchins

Shall, for that vast of night that they may work,

All exercise on thee. Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 326.

4. A roguish child; a mischievous boy.

I trowe the urchin will clyme

To some promotion lastly.

Roy and Barlow, Rede me and be nott Wrothe (ed. Arber, [p. 43].

Pleased Cupid heard, and checked his mother's pride,
"And who's blind now, mamma?" the urchin cried.

Prior, Venus Mistaken.

5. One of a pair of small cylinders covered with card-cloth, used in connection with the card-drum in a carding-machine. E. H. Knight.

II. a. 1. Elfish; mischievous. [Rare.]

Off at eve [she]

Visits the herds along the twilight meadows,

Helping all urchin blasts and ill-luck signs

That the shrew meddling elfe delights to make.

Milton, Comus, l. 845.

Uranges caudatus

northeastern Africa, the male is 18 inches long, of which the tail makes two thirds; the plumage is glossy oil-green, with sub-blue, purple, violet, and bronze tints, in some parts marked with velvety black. Several other species of this genus are described.

urban (ēr-ban), a. and n. [= F. urban = Sp. Pg. It. urbano, < L. urbanus, of or pertaining to a city or city life, hence polite, refined, urbane; as a noun, a dweller in a city; < urbs, city. Cf. suburb, suburbana. Cf. also urbane.] 1. a. 1. Of or belonging to a city or town; resembling a city; characteristic of a city; situated or living in towns or cities: as, an urban population; urban districts.

And, however advanced the urban society may be, . . . the spirit of progress does not spread very far in the country. G. P. Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 183.

2. a. Civil; courteous in manners; polite. [In this sense urbane is now used.] Urban servitudes, in law. See predial servitude, under servitude.

II. n. One who belongs to or lives in a town or city.

2t. Trifling; foolish.

Our Bishop . . . made himself merry with the conceit how easily it was to stride over such urchin articles. No man would find leisure to read the whole 36; they are so frivolous. Bp. Hackett, Alp. Williams, ii. 91. (Daries.)

urchin-fish (ēr'chín-fish), n. A prickly globe-fish or sea-porcupine, Diadon hystrix, or a similar species. See cut under Diadon.

urchin-form (ēr'chín-form), n. The form or type of form of a sea-urchin. Gegenbaur.

urcheon, urchount, u. Obsolete forms of urchin.
urde (ēr-dā'), n. [AF. urdee, urde, pointed, < OHG. MHG. ort, a point, end, angle, edge, place, = AS. ME. ord, point of a sword, point: see ord.] In her.: (a) Having one or more extremities pointed bluntly, as by the lines bounding it making an angle of 90 degrees. (b) Having a single blunt-pointed projection from some part: as, a bend urde, which has usually in the middle of the upper side a prominence ending in a blunt point. (c) Same as varriated. Also urdu, mately.

Urdu (ūr'dō), n. [Also Oordoo; = F. urdu, ourdou; < Hind. urdū, Hindustani, so named because it grew up since the eleventh century in the camps of the Mohammedan conquerors of India as a means of communication between them and the subject population of central Hindustan; prop. zabān-i-urdū, 'camp-language'; < urdū = Turk. ordū, ordi, ordā, a camp, < Pers. ordū, a court, camp, horde of Tatars, also ordū, whence ult. E. horde.] A native name for the present Hindustani tongue. See Hindustani. Also used adjectively.

urdy (ēr'di), u. In her., same as urde.

ure¹ (ūr), n. [< ME. ure, < OF. ure, urere, urere, F. urere, work, action, operation, = Sp. Pg. obra = It. opera, < L. opera, work: see opera, operate, and cf. innere, manure, maneuver.] Operation; use; practice.

And sure it is taken by custome and rre,
Whye yonge you be there is helpe and cure.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 345.

His Majesty could wish the ancient statutes were in ure of holding a parliament every year.

Bacon, Draft of King's Speech, 1614.

We will never from henceforth enact, put in ure, promulge, or execute any new canons, etc.

Act of Submission of Clergy to Henry VIII., in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., ii., note.

ure¹ (ūr), v. t. and i. [< *ure*¹, n.] To work; practise; innure; exercise. More.

ure², n. [< ME. ure, < OF. eur, cür, aür, F. heur (in bon-heur, mal-heur), fate, luck, fortune, F. also augure = Pr. agur = Sp. agüero = Pg. It. augurio, < L. augurium, augury: see augury.] Doublet of augury. Fortune; destiny.

Myne hole attiance, and my lady free,
My goddesso bright, my fortune and my ure.

Court of Love, l. 634.

ure³ (ūr), n. [< L. urus, a kind of wild bull: see urus.] The urus.

The third kind is of them that are named ures. These are of bignes somewhat lesse than elephants, in kind and color and shape like a bull. Golding, Cesar, fol. 163.

ure⁴, pron. A Middle English form of *our*¹.

ure⁵, n. A Middle English form of hour.

ure⁶, n. [< Ir. Gael. uir, mold, earth. Cf. urvy.] Soil: as, an ill ure (a bad soil). [Scotch.] ure⁷, n. See *cure*³.

ure. [F. -ure = Sp. Pg. It. -ura, < L. -ura, a term. of fem. nouns denoting employment or result. It is usually attached to the pp. stem of verbs, and the noun has the same form as the fem. of the future participle: examples are apertura, an opening, armatura, equipment, junctura, a joining, scriptura, a writing, textura, web, etc. In some E. words the termination -ure represents L. -atura (> OF. -üre, > E. -ure), as in armure, now armour, armor, ult. identical with armatura.] A termination of Latin origin, appearing in the formation of many nouns, as in apertura, armatura, junctura, scriptura, textura, fissura, pressure, etc. It is sometimes used as an English formative, as in rafture.

urea (ūr'ē-i), n. [NL. < Gr. oipov, urine: see urine.] Carbamide, CO(NH₂)₂, a crystalline solid, soluble in water, and forming crystalline compounds with both acids and bases. It is the final product of the proteid decomposition in the body, and forms the chief solid constituent of the urine of mammals. It appears also in the urine of birds.

ureal (ūr'ē-al), a. [< urea + -al.] Of, relating to, or containing urea: as, a ureal solution.

ureameter (ūr'ē-an'ē-tēr), n. An apparatus for determining the amount of urea in the urine.

ureametry (ūr'ē-an'ē-tri), n. The quantitative test for urea in the urine.

uredi, a [< *ure*² + -ed.] Fortunate.

In my selfe I me assured
That in my body I was well ured.

The Isle of Ladies, l. 144.

Uredineæ (ūr-rē-dīn'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Brougniart, 1824), < Uredo (-dus) + -ina.] An order of minute ascomycetous fungi, parasitic chiefly upon living flowering plants and ferns, and frequently very injurious to them. It includes the forms known as rust, smut, mildew, etc. The order is remarkable for the peculiar alternation of forms undergone by many of the species, which are known as the acidium form, uredoform, and telotetospore, and which were long considered as independent genera. Puccinia graminis, the so-called corn-mildew, may be taken as the type of the course of development followed by most Uredineæ, the three form-genera Æcidium, Uredo, and Puccinia being different stages of it. The first or acidium stage is the cluster-cup of the barberry; the second or uredoform is the red-rust of grain; and the third or Puccinia is the mature form. See Fungi, Puccinia, rust, 3, mildew, Micro-puccinia, Coniomyces, heterostium.—Tremelloid Uredineæ, a group of Uredineæ which do not possess a sporocarp generation, but consist of a telotetospore-bearing generation with usually softer and more gelatinous membranes.

uredineous (ūr-rē-dīn'ē-us), a. [< Uredineæ + -ous.] 1. Of or pertaining to the Uredineæ.—2. Affected by uredo.

Uredines (ūr-rē-dī-nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Uredo.] In bot., the Uredineæ.

uredinoid (ūr-rē-dī-noid), a. In bot., resembling the Uredineæ, or having their characters.

uredinous (ūr-rē-dī-nus), a. Same as uredineous.

Uredo (ūr-rē'dō), n. [NL. < L. uredo, a blight, a blast, < urere (√ us), kindle, burn: see ustion.]

1. A form-genus or stage in the development of fungi of the order Uredineæ. It is the stage next preceding the final or Puccinia stage, until recently considered a distinct genus, and many forms whose complete life-history is unknown are for convenience still retained under this name. Compare cuts under Puccinia and sporeopium.

2. [l. c.] A receptacle or hymenium in which uredospores are produced.

uredoform (ūr-rē'dō-fōrm), n. In bot., the form assumed by a uredineous fungus in the uredo condition—that is, that stage in which the uredospores are produced.

uredo-fruit (ūr-rē'dō-frōt), n. In bot., same as uredosporium.

uredo-gonidium (ūr-rē'dō-gō-nid'ī-um), n. In bot., same as uredosporium.

uredosporium (ūr-rē'dō-spōr'), n. In bot., in Uredineæ, the peculiar spore produced during the uredoform stage of the fungus. It is formed by asexual separation from a sterigma, and on germination produces a mycelium which bears uredospores or both uredospores and telotetospores. It is produced during the summer, and serves to reproduce and extend the fungus rapidly. See Puccinia, 1 (a) (with cut), heterostium, and *spore*².

uredosporic (ūr-rē'dō-spōr'ik), a. [< uredosporium + -ic.] In bot., of or pertaining to a uredosporium.

ureide (ūr'ē-id or -id), n. [< urea + *-ide*¹.] A compound of urea with an acid radical. The ureides include a large number of urea-derivatives of very complex structure.

uremia, uræmia (ūr-rē'mī-i), n. [NL. uræmia, < Gr. oipov, urine, + aima, blood.] A condition resulting from the retention in the blood of waste products, chiefly urea, that should normally be eliminated by the kidneys. Its symptoms are mainly those of a nervous character, such as headache, nausea, delirium, and convulsions or somnolence followed by coma.

uremic, uræmic (ūr-rē'mik), a. [< uremia + -ic.] Of or pertaining to uremia: causing uremia; affected with uremia: as, uremic convulsions.

Urena (ūr-rē'nā), n. [NL. (Billenius, 1732), < urea, its name in Malabar.] A genus of plants, of the order Malvaceæ, type of the tribe Cereæ. It is characterized by flowers with five connate bractlets, and fruit everywhere roughened by minute hooks. There are 4 or perhaps 6 species, known as Indian mallow, natives of tropical Asia or Africa, with one or two also widely dispersed through warm parts of America. They are herbs or shrubs, with usually angled or lobed leaves, and small yellowish flowers, commonly in sessile clusters. They are employed medicinally for their mucilaginous properties in India and elsewhere. In Brazil the flowers of U. lobata furnish an expectorant, and the roots and stems a decoction used for colic. U. lobata and U. sinuata, both common throughout the tropics, yield from their inner bark a useful fiber; that of the former, the guarania of Brazil, makes a strong cordage and a good paper. At Petang the seedless leaves of U. lobata—there an abundant weed, known as peripat—are collected, dried, and sold for mixing with patchouli, which they resemble.

Ureneæ (ūr-rē'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1862), < Urena + -æ.] A tribe of poly-petalous plants, of the order Malvaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with ten styles, by the staminal column being truncate or five-toothed at the top and externally anther-bearing below, and by five carpels, which separate at maturity. It includes 5 genera, mainly tropical herbs or shrubs. See Pacouia and Urena (the type).

ure-ox (ūr'ōks), n. [< *ur*³ + ox.] The urus. J. T. White, Diet.

Ureæ (ūr-rē'ā), n. [NL. (Gaudichaud, 1826), so called with ref. to the stinging hairs usually present; irreg. < L. uræa, burn: see ustion.] A genus of plants, type of the subtribe Ureæ, of the order Urticæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Urtica by its baccate fruiting calyx. The 22 species are natives of tropical America, Africa, and islands of the Indian and Pacific Oceans. They are shrubs or small trees. A few are climbers, as U. elata of Jamaica, which is said to reach a height of 30 feet. They constitute, together with species of Pilea, the plants known as nettle in the West Indies, replacing there the genus Urtica. U. glabra (U. Sandwicensis), the opule of the Hawaiians, a small tree free from stinging hairs, yields a valuable fiber highly esteemed there for making fishing-nets. Several other species furnish fiber for ropes, as U. baccifera, a small prickly tree frequent from Cuba to Brazil, used medicinally in the West Indies as an aperient. U. tenax, a recently described South African species, yields a fiber resembling ramie.

uresis (ūr-rē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. oipov, urination, < oipov, urinate, < oipov, urine: see urine.] Urination; micturition.

uretal (ūr-rē'tal), a. Same as urethric.

ureter (ūr-rē'tēr), n. [< Gr. oipov, the ure-thra, also one of the urinary ducts of the kidneys. < oipiv, urinate, < oipov, urine: see urine.] The excretory duct of the kidney; a tube conveying the renal excretion (urine) to the bladder, when that structure exists, as in mammals, or into the cloaca, in case no bladder exists—in any case, into the lower part of the allantoic cavity of the fetus, however modified in adult life. See cut under kidney. In man the ureter is a very slender tube, from 15 to 18 inches long, running from the pelvis of the kidney to the base of the bladder, at the posterior angle of the trigonum. It rests chiefly upon the psoas muscle, behind the peritoneum. Its structure includes a fibrous coat, longitudinal and circular muscular fibers, and a lining of mucous membrane, with vessels and nerves from various sources. The ureter pierces the wall of the bladder very obliquely, running for nearly an inch between the muscular and mucous coats of that viscus.

ureteral (ūr-rē'te-ral), a. Same as urethric.

ureteric (ūr-rē'tēr'ik), a. [< ureter + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a ureter.

ureteritis (ūr-rē'te-rī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. oipov, the ureter, + -itis.] Inflammation of the ureter.

ureterolith (ūr-rē'tēr-ō-lith), n. A urinary concretion formed or lodged in the ureter.

urethane, urethan (ūr-rē-thān, -than), n. [< ur(ea) + eth(er) + -ane.] In chem., any ester of carbamic acid. Ethyl urethane, CO NH₂.O.C₂H₅, a white crystalline solid, somewhat used in medicine as a hypnotic.

urethra (ūr-rē'thrū), n. pl. urethra (-thré). [= F. urèthre = Sp. urètra = Pg. urètra = It. urètra, < L. urèthra, < Gr. oipov, the passage for urine, < oipiv, urinate, < oipov, urine: see urine.] A modification of a part of a urogenital sinus into a tube or a groove for the discharge of the secretion of the genital or urinary organs, or both; in most mammals, including man, a complete tube from the bladder to the exterior, conveying urine and semen in the male sex, urine only in the female; in some birds, a penial groove for the conveyance of semen only. The urethra of the male is always a part of the penis, or a penial urethra, continuous usually with the urethral part of the urogenital sinus; that of the female is only exceptionally a part of the clitoris. In man the urethra extends from the neck of the bladder to the end of the penis, usually a distance of 8 or 9 inches. It is divided into three sections. The prostatic is that first section of the urethra which is embraced by the prostatic gland, 1½ inches long, somewhat fusiform; upon its floor is a longitudinal ridge, the verru muncum or caput mallei, on each side of which is a depression, the prostatic sinus, perforated by openings of the prostatic ducts. In advance of the veru is a median depression or cul-de-sac, variously known as the vesicula prostatica, vesicula mallei, sinus prostaticus, uteros mallei, etc.; and the orifices of the ejaculatory ducts of the seminal vesicles open here. The membranous is that second section of the urethra, about ½ inch long, which extends from the prostatic gland to the corpus spongiosum; it is contracted in caliber, perforates the deep perineal fascia, and is embraced by layers reflected from this fascia and by the specialized compressor urethra muscle. The spongy section of the urethra extends from the membranous section to the end of the penis, being all that part of the urethra which is embraced by the penial corpus spongiosum. It is dilated at its beginning—this dilatation being sometimes specified as the bulbus section of the urethra, and further marked by the opening of the ducts of Cowper's glands—and at its end, within the glans penis, this terminal enlargement being the fovea narinbaris. The urethra ends in a narrow vertical slit, the meatus urinarius. Numerous submucous follicles, the glands of Littre, open into the spongy section of the urethra; one of these openings forms a recess of considerable size, the lacuna naryna. The substance of the urethra includes mucous, muscular, and erectile tissue. In the female the urethra is very short, about 1½ inches in length, and much more simple in structure and relations than that of the male.—Bulb of the urethra. See bulb.—Bulbous urethra, that part of the extent of the urethra which corresponds to its bulb. See bulb.—Crista urethrae. See crista.—Membranous urethra, the membranous section of the urethra. See def.—Penial urethra, a urethral groove or tube which forms part of the penis of any animal; in man, the spongy urethra.—Prostatic urethra, the prostatic section of the urethra. See def.—Spongy urethra, the spongy section of the urethra. See def.—Triangular ligament of the urethra. See triangular. Also called Camber's ligament and Carcasson's ligament.

urethral (ū-rē'thral), a. [< urethra + -al.] Of or pertaining to the urethra.—Urethral crest. Same as crista urethrae (which see, under crista).—Urethral fever. See fever.

urethritic (ū-rē-thrit'ik), a. [< urethritis + -ic.] Affected with urethritis.

urethritis (ū-rē-thrit'is), n. [NL., < urethra + -itis.] Inflammation of the urethra.

urethrocele (ū-rē-thrō-sēl), n. Protrusion of a part of the urethral wall through the meatus urinarius.

urethrometer (ū-rē-throm'e-tēr), n. An instrument for measuring the caliber of the urethra, and for locating and determining the degree of contraction of a stricture.

urethroplastic (ū-rē-thrō-plas'tik), a. [< urethroplasty + -ic.] Of or pertaining to urethroplasty.

urethroplasty (ū-rē-thrō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. oīpōthra, urethra, + πλάσσω, < πλάσσω, form, shape, mold; see plastic.] In surg., an operation for remedying defects in the urethra.

urethroscope (ū-rē-thrō-skōp), n. An instrument, somewhat resembling a catheter, through which, by means of a projected light, it is possible to see the mucous membrane lining the wall of the urethra.

urethroscopy (ū-rē-thrō-skō-pi), n. Inspection of the urethral mucous membrane by means of the urethroscope.

urethrotome (ū-rē-thrō-tōm), n. [< Gr. oīpōthra, urethra, + -τομή, < τέμνω, τμήν, cut.] In surg., an instrument for performing internal urethrotomy.

urethrotomic (ū-rē-thrō-tōm'ik), a. [< urethrotomy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to urethrotomy.

urethrotomy (ū-rē-thrō'tō-mi), n. [< Gr. oīpōthra, urethra, + -τομή, < τέμνω, τμήν, cut.] In surg., cutting of the urethra, usually for the relief of stricture. External urethrotomy is division of the deep parts of the urethra by a knife passed through the perineum; internal urethrotomy is division of any part of the urethra by a cutting-instrument introduced through the meatus.

uretic (ū-ret'ik), a. [Also uritic; < L. urcticus, < Gr. οὐρτικός, of or pertaining to urine, < οὐρίν, urinate, < οἶστος, urine; see urine.] In med., of or relating to or promoting the flow of urine.

urf (ēr'), n. A stunted, ill-grown child. [Scotch.]

Ye useless, weasel-like urf that ye are.

Hogg, The Brownie o' Bodbeek.

urge (ērj), v. pret. and pp. urged, pp. urging. [< L. urgere, press, push, force, drive, urge; perhaps akin to vergere, bend, turn, and Gr. ὑπέρω (hyperō), repress, constrain, ἐπύρνω, shut in, Skt. √ varj, wrench. Cf. *verge*² and wrick, wreak.] I. trans. 1. To press; impel; force onward.

Heir urges heir, like wave impelling wave.

Pope, Imit. of Hor., II. ii. 253.

Evening must usher night, night urge the morrow.

Shelley, Adonais, xxi.

2. To hasten laboriously; quicken with effort. And there will want at no time who are good at circumstances; but men who set their minds on main matters, and sufficiently urge them in these most difficult times, I find not many.

Milton, Free Commonwealth.

Through the thick deserts headlong urged his flight.

Pope, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, i.

3. To press the mind or will of; serve as a motive or impelling cause; impel; constrain; spur.

My tongue,

Urged by my heart, shall utter all the thoughts

My youth hath known. Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 5.

4. To press or ply hard with arguments, entreaties, or the like; request with earnestness; importune; solicit earnestly.

And when they urged him till he was ashamed, he said, Send.

2 Ki. ii. 17.

Uree the king

To do me this last right.

Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 157.

5. To press upon attention; present in an earnest manner; press by way of argument or in opposition; insist on; allege in extenuation, justification, or defense; as, to urge an argument; to urge the necessity of a case.

I never in my life

Did hear a challenge urged more modestly.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 2. 53.

For God's sake, urge your faults no more, but mend!

Beau. and Fl., Coxcomb, v. 2.

6. To ply hard in a contest or an argument; attack briskly.

Every man has a right in dispute to urge a false religion with all its absurd consequences.

Tillotson.

7. To provoke; incite; exasperate.

Urged not my father's anger. Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 3. 27.

The Britons, urged and oppress'd with many unsufferable injuries, had all banded themselves to a general revolt.

Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

II.† intrans. 1. To press on or forward.

He strives to urge upward. Donne.

2. To incite; stimulate; impel.

The combat urges, and my soul's on fire.

Pope, Iliad, vi. 453.

3. To make a claim; insist; persist.

One of his men . . . urged extremely for 't, and showed what necessity belonged to 't. Shak., T. of A., iii. 2. 14.

4. To produce arguments or proofs; make allegations; declare.

I do beseech your lordships

That, in this case of justice, my accusers,

Be what they will, may stand forth face to face,

And freely urge against me.

Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 3. 48.

urge (ērj), n. [< urge, v.] The act of urging; impulse. [Rare.]

Creation dumb, unconscious, yet alive

With some deep inward passion unexpressed,

And swift, concentric, never-ceasing urge.

R. W. Gilder, The Celestial Passion, Recognition.

urgence (ēr'jens), n. [< F. urgence = Sp. Pg. urgencia = It. urgenza; as urgen(t) + -ce.] Urgency. Heywood, Prologues and Epilogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 356).

urgency (ēr'jen-si), n. [As urgence (see -cy).] The state or character of being urgent. Specifically—(a) Importunity; insistence; earnest solicitation: as, to yield to a person's urgency. (b) Pressure of necessity; imperative force: as, the urgency of want or distress; the urgency of the occasion. (c) In the British Parliament, a formal declaration that a measure is urgent, in the interest of the state, and ought to receive prompt and early action, taking precedence of all other measures. Urgency may be declared by a vote of three to one in a house of not less than 300 members.

urgent (ēr'jent), a. [< F. urgent = Sp. Pg. It. urgente, < L. urgent(-)s, ppr. of urgere, push, urge; see urge.] Having the character of urging, pressing, or constraining. Specifically—(a) Of things: Pressing; demanding immediate action; forcing itself upon notice; cogent; vehement: as, an urgent case or occasion. See urgency (c).

Please your highness

To take the urgent hour. Shak., W. T., i. 2. 465.

Which Jesus seeing, He upon him threw

The urgent yoke of an express injunction.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 147.

He evaded the urgent demands of the Castilians for a convocation of cortes. Prescott, Ferd. and Is., ii. 25.

In ten minutes he had a second telegraphic message on its way, . . . one so direct and urgent that I should be sure of an answer to it.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 63.

(b) Of persons: Pressing with importunity. Ex. xii. 33.

However, Oedipus is almost out of his wits about the Matter, and is urgent for an account of Particulars.

Jeremy Collier, Short View (ed. 1698), p. 107.

urgently (ēr'jent-li), adv. In an urgent manner; with pressing importunity; insistently; pressingly; vehemently; forcibly.

urger (ēr'jer), n. [< urge + -er.] One who urges or importunes. Fletcher, Valentinian, i. 3.

urgewonder (ēr'jwun'dēr), n. A variety of barley.

This barley is called by some urgewonder.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

Urginea (ēr-jū'ē-jī), n. [NL. (Steinheil, 1834), so called with ref. to the compressed seeds; < L. urgere, press, urge; see urge.] A genus of liliaceous plants, of the tribe Scilleæ, including the official squill. It is distinguished from the type genus Scilla, in which it was formerly included, by its deciduous perianth, a three-angled capsule, and much-flattened seeds. It includes about 24 species, natives of Europe, Africa, and India, especially of the Mediterranean region. They are bulbous plants with linear or thong-like radical leaves, and an unbranched leafless scape bearing in a terminal raceme many small whitish flowers, rarely yellowish or pink, usually with a median band of deeper color along each segment. U. maritima (U. Scilla), the official squill (see scilla), 2 or sea-onion, produces large bulbs inclosing many fleshy whitish layers, very acid when fresh, but less so on drying; they are imported from the Mediterranean for medicinal use. U. altissima is similarly used in South Africa.

Urgonian (ēr-gō'ni-an), n. [< L. Urgo(n)-, F. Orgon (see def.) + -ian.] A division of the Lower Cretaceous, according to the systematic nomenclature of the French and Belgian geologists. The typical Urgonian from Orgon, near Avignon (whence the name), is a massive limestone, in places developed to a thickness of over 1,000 feet, and containing an abundance of hippuritids and various other fossils.

Uria (ū'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Möhring, 1752; Brisson, 1760), < L. urinarī, plunge under water, dive; see urinarī, urinator.] A genus of Alcidæ; the guillemots and murre: used with various restrictions for any of the slender-billed birds of the auk family, as U. troile, the common foolish murre or guillemot, and U. grylle, the black guillemot. Since the genus Loxia was instituted for the former, Uria has usually been restricted to the latter, in which sense it is otherwise called Cephus or Cerphus. See cuts under guillemot and murre.

uric (ū'rik), a. [= F. urique = Sp. Pg. urico, *< NL. uricus, < Gr. οἶστος, urine; see urine.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from urine.—Uric acid, an acid, $C_5H_4N_4O_6$, characteristic of urine. It crystallizes in scales of various shapes of a brilliant white color and silky luster when pure, but in the urine the crystals are of a reddish-yellow color. It is inodorous and insipid, heavier than water, nearly insoluble in it when cold, and only to a slight extent dissolved by it when hot. The solution reddens litmus-paper, but feebly. When it is dissolved in nitric acid, and the solution is evaporated and treated with ammonia, a fine purple color is produced; by this reaction uric acid may be detected. It occurs in small quantity in the healthy urine of man and quadrupeds, but is the chief constituent in the urine of birds and reptiles; hence it is often found abundantly in Puvian guano. It is normally present in small amount in the blood as urate, and it constitutes the principal proportion of some urinary calculi and of the concretions causing the complaint known as the gravel. Sometimes called lithic acid.

uricemia, uricæmia (ū-ri-sē'mi-ā), n. [NL. uricæmia, irreg. < uricus, uric, + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] Same as lithæmia.

Uriconian (ū-ri-kō'ni-an), n. [< Uriconium (see def.) + -ian.] The name given by some English geologists to a series of volcanic rocks, of which the Wrekin, in Shropshire, England, is chiefly made up, and which is supposed to occupy a position very near the bottom of the fossiliferous series. The name is from the Roman station Uriconium, the site of the present village of Wroxeter, in Shropshire.

uridrosis (ū-ri-drō'sis), n. The excretion of certain urinary constituents, notably urea, in the sweat.
